WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
And the song of victory.

J. H. Garrison.

1809 CENTENNIAL PROPAGANDA 1909
CHURCHES OF CHRIST

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

This Educational number of The Christian-Evangelist is sent forth with the prayers that it may help the brotherhood to a clearer vision of the duty of sending an educated ministry in the van of our great hosts soon to cross over the borders and into our second century. The captains of the Lord's army, the shepherds of his unifying flocks must be superior men intellectually as well as morally and spiritually. It is not only our duty to insist that young aspirants for these positions should thoroughly qualify themselves but to help them.

Here, as always, the severe angel of duty is accompanied by the good angel of privilege. How happy one would be to hand the struggling life saver a good oar to replace his broken one. What a gracious privilege it is to be a factor in proffering the Captain of our salvation a fully equipped young soldier, even superior to the old veteran whom age has mustered out of active service. In educating a candidate for the ministry you are doing for the church what they do elsewhere who give the reaper a sharper scythe, the miner a keener drill, the physician better herbs, the knight a stronger blade, the mariner a wider sail.

No other feature of the great convention could be more inspirational than a corps of 5,000 young men brought from our colleges where they are preparing for the ministry of the word. It would create a world-wide sensation. Will not steps be taken to have this one of the great events of 1909?

As part of its contribution to our Centennial celebration, the Christian Publishing Company is maintaining its own living link evangelist. While it is desirable the churches should assist in his support, he is sent to poor but promising fields without financial conditions. We are pleased with this tribute to his efficiency: "I wish to congratulate you on maintaining an evangelist in the home field which is ripe unto harvest. Brother J. D. Lawrence is the right man in the right place. You were wise in the selection of this efficient soldier of the cross as your representative in the Lord. Brother Lawrence has encouraged and strengthened this congregation by his visits and series of sermons. We thank you very much for sending unto us such a blessing."—W. J. Waggoner (minister), Port Jefferson, Ohio.

It will be remembered that when at the San Francisco convention attention was called to the fact that there was not a single church of Christ in New Hampshire, Bro. J. H. Garrison, in the name of himself and friends, pledged an earnest effort for the establishment of a church patterned after the New Testament order of things in that commonwealth. Accordingly, Herbert Yeuell was engaged, a tabernacle rented, a singing evangelist employed and a meeting begun in Manchester last Lord's day. The prayers of God's people everywhere are asked for the success of this enterprise. The expenses of the meeting will be fully $1,000. So far but $511.10 have been pledged toward these expenses. We do not believe the brethren will permit this meeting to languish or prematurely close for lack of a few hundred dollars. Will not each reader of this paragraph send a gift at once to be placed on this altar? Dollar contributions will be thankfully accepted. Several $25.00 offerings have been forwarded us and others will be welcomed. Full reports will be given in this paper. If this emprise is successful we hope attempts will be made to establish a church in every county in the United States, where we are not now represented, before 1909.

Education and the Centennial.

BY W. R. WARREN,
Centennial Secretary.

Among the world's religions Christianity alone is equally adapted to every climate, every race and every century. Within the last hundred years a million and a quarter Christians have stood forth from their brethren to declare that essential Christianity is equally adapted to all nationalities, all temperaments, all classes and all conditions; that it must include all the truth and reject all error; that it is a divine system and that no human modification is allowable. Starting with no presupposition as to the character of this God-given religion, and every one claiming for himself and according to every other full liberty to search the Scripture and to teach and practice just what he finds to be taught and enjoined there we challenge the world to behold to-day a consensus of doctrine, a uniformity of practice and a consistency of organization unequalled in any creed-fenced or prelate-ruled body in the world. Others may account for this as they can, but we claim only and with all humility that this universal agreement is due to universal and glad submission to him who is the Way, the Truth, the Life. It is perfectly natural that the Truth should unify and harmonize those who hold it. Moreover no error and no partial truth can finally satisfy the human heart. It cries out for the whole truth as thirsty lips for water. Any apparent satisfaction with falsehood is thus to mistake as to its real character. Truth needs no other recommendation than the clear expression of itself.

In Christ Jesus the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us—all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Only ignorance separates unbelievers from Christians and only ignorance divides believers into more or less hostile denominations.

Education, then, is the final evangelistic and missionary method and education is the only means by which Christian union may be realized. Then the Centennial of our Christian union movement should witness unprecedented advancement in education. Preachers for this movement are demanded in ever increasing numbers, and their education should be as complete as possible. They must not only teach but train teachers. Theirs is not to merely impart knowledge but in the dread liberty of the Gospel to incite men to go themselves in quest of truth. It is not merely to kindle other torches but to start other torch kindlers. Jesus started a perpetual succession of teachers. There is much teaching in our Bible schools and churches, and a little in our homes, but in our schools and colleges there is nothing but teaching. Here at last is the test of the permanent strength and vital endurance of our plea. If it only wins the plaudits of the populace and the money of the rich it will pass, but having established a succession of teachers it is chained to the chariot of God's unfailing and unceasing progress.

Among the Disciples of Christ there have been built sorts of educational institutions: colleges with ministerial training, more or less closely joined in the program; Bible colleges independent of other schools; Bible colleges connected with secular institutions and female colleges. Worthy celebration of the centennial involves completing the creditable endowment of all these; but even more it requires the correction of that truly damnable heresy that material equipment is the first matter for consideration in selecting a college for a young man or young woman. Look for the school that offers most of the things that money can not buy even in this trafficking age. To one who has come to love the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free and to plead for the union for which Christ prayed that means that he will make his choice within the closed circle of colleges that definitely stand for union in Christ and liberty under Christ. Money follows the man. Let us send all our children where the influence of our plea is dominant, enlist twice as many to take training in our Bible colleges for the coming year and witness how the material resources of all our schools are doubled before 1909.

Our Centennial Co-laborers.

The Christian-Evangelist has the right and only view of this federation question. The —— has made too much out of it. Let us not grow radical, conservative, sectarian in ourselves. We need not give up any of our principles for which we are pleading to co-operate with the denominations. My support is with The Christian-Evangelist.—Hugh C. Gresham, minister.

I must tell you how I sympathize with you, because I know you are right. Keep up a stout heart and you will be vindicated some day. Bro. Isaac Errett was persecuted the same way by his brethren. I have taken The Christian-Evangelist a great many years and would not do without it. May your days be long in the land. —Mrs. S. E. Turner, Pine Flats, Pa.

Current Events

The War on Trusts.

Attorney-General Moody has sent to the Senate, by request, a list of the corporations against which proceedings have been instituted under the Sherman anti-trust act. They include the Standard Oil Company, against the officers of which criminal action has been begun, and the tobacco, drug, elevator, beef, paper and sugar trusts. In addition, several railroads are being prosecuted for granting rebates, and action is being taken against the St. Louis Terminal Association, which is a most egregious trust. This is a good record for the administration. It is reported that the Standard Oil Company has decided to abandon its policy of secrecy, publish its reports, increase its capital stock from $100,000,000 to $600,000,000, most of the new stock being divided in the form of stock dividend among the present holders, and list its stock upon the exchanges. And, speaking of trusts, the managers of five ice companies in Toledo, O., have been fined $5,000 each and sentenced to one year in the workhouse. As a result of a combination, the price of ice had gone up nearly 100 per cent, and as a result of the prosecution, the price has gone down again.

The Jewish Massacre.

Details about the massacre of Jews at Bialystok, Russia, have been coming in slowly. The Russian government is doing its best to prevent them coming in at all, but the most careful of censors can not do much more than delay the transmission of news. The total casualties are now put at 250, of which 100 were deaths—outright murders, many of them with torture. Besides the number killed and injured Jews, a considerable number of Christians were killed or wounded, partly by accident and partly in settlement of private grudges or in pursuit of spoil, for which the general chaos of the massacre afforded large opportunity. The real cause of this awful outbreak of savagery is not yet definitely known. It appears that some one threw a bomb at the Corpus Christi procession, but there is no evidence that it was done by a Jew or even that any one sincerely believed that it was done by a Jew. There are some indications that the massacre was deliberately planned, though no convincing proof that the plan was originated or known in St. Petersburg.

A Cure for Suicide.

Earthquake cures the suicide mania. It may not be a convenient or popular remedy, but it does the work. In San Francisco before the late quake there were, on an average, ten suicides every week. But in the two months since that event, only three persons in that city have found refuge in suicide from the insupportable ills of life. And yet there have been more troubles in San Francisco during these months than ever before. Why then? First, people have been busy. That prevents despair. Second, they have been interested. Every man in San Francisco, however miserable, has been eager to see what would happen next. Third, when a whole city is engulfed in obvious and palpable calamity, the private sorrows of an individual look too small, even to himself, to justify suicide. Lastly, a misfortune that is big enough wakes the heroic in even little men and disinclines them to make a cowardly surrender to fate. There is a whole philosophy of life here, if one will stop to get it out.

Christo-centric Geography.

A picturesque suggestion, made by a member of the French Academy of Sciences, contemplates the establishment of the standard meridian for the measurement of longitude at Bethlehem instead of Greenwich. Greenwich means nothing except that the British royal observatory happens to be located there. There would be an obvious appropriateness in measuring distance from the place of Christ's birth as we measure years from the time of it.

Korean Trades.

Japan is entering upon an aggressive program of subsidy and protection to get control of the trade with Korea and Manchuria. The plan includes free entry for Japanese goods at Walny, though other foreign goods must pay duty, free freight transportation for Japanese goods on that part of the Chinese Eastern railway in Manchuria which is under Japanese control, the payment by the government of half the marine freight on goods shipped from Japan, and the granting of government loans aggregating several million dollars to manufacturing and exporting companies. Such measures will obviously give Japanese merchants and manufacturers a vast advantage in the competition for trade in Korea and Manchuria. But whether the advantage will be worth what it costs, is another question. Here is where the "infant industries" begin to get their grip on Japan. The infants will flourish, beyond question, on this predigested food of subsidy and special favor. But it is just possible, in cases like this, that what is good for the infants may be bad for the family. A dozen great and prosperous Japanese exporting firms will not necessarily mean real prosperity for Japan. For solemn warning on the subject of infant industries Japan might well cast a studious eye on the present economic condition of this country.

Autos and Horses.

A carriage maker is quoted as saying that the coming in of the cheap automobile had given a great impetus to his business, especially in the manufacture of the finer grades of vehicles. Personally, we had not noticed the arrival of the cheap automobile. There are some that do not cost a great deal of money, but these are generally worth still less and are therefore not cheap. But accepting the premise, the argument is that, since the relatively poor can now afford automobiles, the rich are returning to thoroughbreds and fine carriages. Just like the fool rich. There always are those whose only interest in anything is the fact that they can afford it and other people can not. But these people who do things with real interest or vital motive just because other folks can't, are, after all, only a shade more despicable than that other and larger group of those who do things merely because others do. But as to the carriage maker's statement of fact, we do not believe it. The auto for the poor has not arrived, though the poor auto has been here some time.

Places for the Young.

The National Medical Association meeting at Boston recently furnished occasion for several utterances of the sort that Prof. Osler is said to have made, but which he never did make. The gist of them was that old men ought to pass off the stage of action when their vitality becomes impaired and make way for young men to fill their places. Now we are not disposed to discuss the question as to the age when men become unserviceable, nor the other very important question as to the moral and spiritual service which may be and often is rendered by men who are no longer actively serviceable. The ridiculous thing about these recommendations to old men to retire is the assertion or implication that they are holding the places which younger men ought to have. Is the world, then, organized like an army of fixed size, with exactly so many places of each rank, so that nobody can be promoted until somebody dies or retires? Not so. There are always places for the men who can make places. And as a rule the existing places go to the most efficient men, whether young or old. The business world is unsentimental. It does not keep old men on the pay roll because they are old. Any young man who whines about being kept down by the retention of inefficient old men is, as a rule, only confessing his own inefficiency.

Government by Commission.

The suggestion is being made that San Francisco may profit by the example of Galveston in the reorganization of her municipal government. After the Galveston flood, when the machinery of local government was completely disorganized, a temporary administration was organized, consisting of five commissioners, four of whom had charge severally of the departments of finance, water and sewerage, public works, police and fire department, while the fifth served as president of the board. The plan worked so well in the emergency that it was continued after the emergency was passed, and it still works well. Some other smaller cities are considering the adoption of the plan, and Houston, Tex., has already done so. The advantage of the system is that it effects a complete and obvious placing of the responsibility for the conduct of the city's business, and as nearly as possible eliminates party politics from it. The commissioners have ample power in their respective departments. If things are not managed satisfactorily the blame can not be laid on a wicked minority. Each commissioner is directly responsible to the people for results. Such a system is suited for times of special emergency by reason of its simplicity of organization, and so far as it has yet been tried it seems to work equally well under normal conditions. Perhaps nothing less than tidal waves and earthquakes can shake down the fabric of corrupt political machinery in our cities and cleanse their foulness. But if it can be done, even by such violent means, the calamities will not have been in vain.

Christian Union: A Historical Study.

IV. The Protestant Era: The Period of Reunion.

13. External Motives to Union.

We have spoken of the inevitableness of the tendency toward unity in the church, by reason of the internal law of its life unfolding without, according to the divine order of progressive development. It remains to be said that this tendency of the internal law of life is mightily reinforced by external conditions in the world to which the church is called to minister. The needs of humanity make a powerful appeal to this inward law of life, which is the law of love. Love is always stimulated to make its greatest sacrifices and put forth its highest efforts to relieve from suffering, or protect from peril, the object of its affections. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." When will it be written that the Church "so loved the world" that it gave up its sectarian spirit, aims, ambitions, names, creeds, its half-hearted consecration, and whatever else hinders its unity and co-operation, that the world might not perish, but have everlasting life? Sometime that fact must be written if the world is ever to be redeemed by Christ. The infinite love of God, which found expression in Christ, must also find expression in his Church, which is to be the medium for conveying that love to a perishing world.

In the past, it must be confessed, the Church has been so much absorbed in defining and defending its theological position, so occupied with questions of organization and government, so exhausted by its efforts at denominational propaganda, that it has not caught a clear vision of the world's needs and of its own obligation to minister to these needs.

It is only recently that it seems to have become conscious of the stupendous tasks which Christ has laid upon it, and of its need of unity in order to the accomplishment of these tasks. What the Church of to-day needs, more than anything else, perhaps, to fill it with the spirit of consecration, unification, and co-operation, is to catch a clear and distinct vision of this world's needs as seen through the eyes of Jesus Christ. Such a vision would humble it, put it upon its knees in prayer, and cause it to cry to God for a fresh anointing of the Holy Spirit, to fit it to accomplish these great tasks. Let us look for a moment at some of these needs which appeal to the Church for united action.

Three men out of every five, of all the millions that dwell upon the globe, abide even yet in pagan darkness. So far as these three-fifths of the human race are concerned, God's love manifested in the sending of his Son, and Christ's death for the sins of men, in manifestation of that same love, were in vain. They have not yet heard the good news, and are "without God and without hope in the world." Christ has called out his Church from the world to carry to these hopeless millions the good news of salvation, and he prayed for its unity to the end that this sublime purpose might be accomplished. Oh, if we only had ears to hear the plaintive and inarticulate cry that comes from the heart of the heathen world—its deep moan of anguish because it knows not God nor the meaning and mystery of life! If we only had eyes to see the moral desolation that prevails, even yet in so-called Christian lands, and the gigantic evils which threaten our civilization and all that is dearest and most sacred in life! If we only had hearts to appreciate the religious indifference that lies like a blight upon so large a part of our population, and could realize that these great tasks remain unaccomplished, and these gigantic evils unremedied, because there has not been, and is not even yet, a united Church, how rapidly would our little differences and prejudices give way before these mighty motives for united action! The Church has lost its moral leadership in the great reforms of the age because of its divisions and internal strifes. That leadership can only be regained by closing up its divided ranks and undertaking seriously the overthrow of these great moral evils which oppose the progress of the kingdom of God. Every cry that comes from the desolate heart of orphanage; every moan of anguish that comes from neglected widowhood and poverty; every ruined life and wrecked home which may attribute its downfall to the open saloon and the gambling hell, is a challenge to the Church to vindicate its divine character and mission by rising to the needs of the hour. Every form of unbelief and of practical atheism which defies the law of God and tramples under its unhallowed feet the sacred rights of men, and all false "isms," philosophies and cults, that draw men away from the feet of Christ, are so many calls to the Church to rise to the height of its great opportunity and obligation. All this widespread corruption that has tarnished the fair fame of our nation and people, this mammon worship and public and private graft, is an awful impeachment of the fidelity of the Church in molding the lives and characters of men.

These are only a few of the external motives, in the great world without, which appeal with convincing power to the life within the Church to organize, mobilize and unify its forces to meet these needs. Once the Church comes to realize the magnitude of its responsibilities for the performance of these great tasks, how gladly would we all join hands with our brothers who differ with us in some things, but who agree with us in many more things, in order that we may work together, as far as possible, for the overthrow of Satan's kingdom and for bringing in the triumphant reign of the kingdom of God!

Just before a great naval conflict in which England was to measure the strength of her navy against that of another nation, Lord Nelson said to two of his high officers who were at enmity with each other, as he placed their hands together, "Be friends: yonder is your enemy!" Is not Jesus Christ to-day seeking to put the hands of his divided Church into his own wounded palm, and saying to all his followers, "Be ye friends: yonder are your enemies?" Lift us, lift all thy church, Oh Lord, to this Mount of Vision, that we may see the world and its needs as thou seest them, and send it forth, a united and consecrated force, to minister to human need, and subdue this whole earth to thy glorious and beneficent reign!

Education, Patriotism, Religion.

In these three words are summed up the forces which have made this Republic what it is as a free, independent, liberty-loving, and united nation, occupying a prominent place in the vanguard of the world's highest civilization. Whatever of virtue, enlightenment, stability, reverence for God and respect for the rights of men, enter into and constitute the greatness of this nation owe their existence to the joint operation of these three mighty forces. It has been our custom for years, in our educational number, the first issue in July, to recognize the essential alliance of these powerful agencies in promoting the highest welfare of the nation and of the world.

We place education first because it is the first in order. Beginning at home, in infancy, it is developed through the agency of our public schools, colleges, and universities, or, if denied the latter, through such other educational influences as come from reading, travel, conversation, and experience. From the beginning of our government education has been recognized by our leading statesmen as essential to the perpetuity of our free institutions. Our whole public school system from the "little red school house" to the state university, is based on this theory. Other nations, ruled and guided by privileged classes, may exist in the absence of general education, but not so a republic in which all the people are the sovereigns, and in the government of which all have a part. Reason and experience both teach us that the higher institutions of learning are essential to the efficiency of the lower, seeing that only the highest educated minds are capable of managing wisely the rudimentary training of the young. Without a liberal supply of college and university-trained men in all the walks of life, making their influence felt in their various communities in behalf of the things that are most worth while, our country can never achieve the real greatness to which it should aspire.

One of the strongest passions in human life is love of country. Under its mighty influence men go to the battle field, and to death, chanting the songs of patriotism. No people on earth have furnished higher examples of lofty and heroic devotion to flag and country than the citizens of our own Republic. A nation whose citizens are animated by this principle needs no large standing army, for at the first call of their country, its citizens forsake their farms and factories, their schools and offices, and all the varied pursuits of peace, to defend its honor and rights against the invasion of any foreign, or domestic, foe. In the last analysis this love of country is love of one's fellowmen, and the country for their sakes. To this mighty, unselfish passion we are indebted for the existence of our own nation, whose independence we celebrate on the Fourth of July. As long as patriotism remains pure and unperverted, neither stifled by gross commercialism nor undermined by false political theories, the future of our country will be safe.

But back of education, and back of patriotism, as the underlying motive, and as a guiding principle, is religion—the love of God and of our fellowmen. The highest form of religion which the world knows is that revealed through Jesus Christ, and it is his religion that founded this nation and has given it whatever of true greatness it possesses. Christ alone, of all the world's teachers, has taught us the true relation of man to God and of man to his fellowmen. It is easy to see how this recognition of our divine and human relationships lies at the basis of all true ideas of government and of religion. The Declaration of Independence and the American Republic lay, potentially, in the teaching of Jesus in relation to the great commandments—love God supremely and your neighbor as yourself. The greatest statesmen which this country has produced, from the "Father of His Country" to President Roosevelt, have recognized the vital relation of religion to the permanency and prosperity of our government. The present wide-extended exposure of corruption and dishonesty, in public office and in private monopolies, is but an illustration of the rising ethical standard among the people and of a quickened public conscience. This, of course, we owe to religion, and it is only in obedience to its stern demands for honesty and purity that these evils can be overcome and the life of the nation be preserved.

It is because our colleges combine, in a pre-eminent degree, these three mighty forces of civilization—education, patriotism, and religion—that we give this number of the paper to a presentation of their claims upon public patronage. They are among the greatest bulwarks of civil and religious liberty. They stand for the widest culture, for the highest altruistic ideals in love of country and fellowmen, and for the noblest form of religion—the Christianity of Christ and of the New Testament. They educate for service. They train their students with a view to their serving their fellowmen, whether in church or state, and teach them that in so doing they are serving God. They have received too little recognition at our hands. To them we are indebted for the men and the women who have done most to make known to the world, and to commend to the favorable consideration of thoughtful people, the principles of a Reformation which has for its aim the glory of God and the good of our fellowmen.

Education, patriotism, religion, these three; but the greatest of these is religion. But it is only as patriotism and religion are enlightened by education that they become the true and efficient servants of men and of God and conservators of all that is dearest and best in our civilization.

Notes and Comments.

The last topic of the mid-week prayer-meeting—Jesus rebuking the narrowness of his disciples—contained two instructive incidents: His rebuke of John for forbidding one to cast out demons in his name "because he followed not us," and of John and James, who wished to "call down fire from heaven" on the Samaritans who refused to entertain Jesus and his disciples. The first incident teaches us that we are to rejoice in all the good that is being done in the name of Christ in all religious bodies and to regard them as co-workers with us, in so far as they are working the will of Christ. The second incident teaches us that we are not to return unkindness for unkindness shown to us. John and James, perhaps, felt that as they were out "on the firing-line," among the enemies of the Jews, they would be justified in resorting to extreme measures. "Back yonder in Jerusalem," they might have said, "it is all very well to be courteous; but out there among the Samaritans the thing to do is to call down fire!" But Jesus said in effect, "You misjudge the whole nature of my mission. The son of man came not to destroy men, but to save them. I would have you be kind and forgiving toward all men, but especially toward these Samaritans whose prejudices and ill-will are to be overcome." If we take the lesson in these two incidents to heart they will help to solve some of our current problems.

That old adage about "fighting the devil with fire" is one of Satan's own falsehoods. Nothing pleases his Satanic majesty better than to have his enemies attack him with the very element with which he is most familiar, and in which he is most at home. To use Satan's method and spirit in trying to overcome him is the very worst kind of tactics. "Overcome evil with good" is the divine method. Allowing that the devil is at the bottom of all bitterness and narrowness manifested toward us, how shall we most successfully overcome it? Not by calling down fire from heaven to destroy them, but by praying for them that despitefully use us, and by blessing them that curse us. "But that is contrary to human nature." Perhaps it is contrary to unregenerate human nature, but it is in exact harmony with the spirit of Christ, without which we are none of his. It would give a resistless power to our plea for Christian union by a return to the simplicity that is in Christ, if its advocates were able, by divine grace, to advocate it and overcome its enemies in this spirit. Why not try it? Why should not our pulpits and religious journals urge it as a duty to the cause we plead, and as an attainment worthy of those who would be known as Christians, or Disciples of Christ?

There is a rebellion abroad against our doctored divinity, like our doctored meat products. One often wonders upon what principle some of our institutions of learning bestow their honorary degrees. Much as we admire Mr. Folk, we are bound to confess that there are a number of men not a dozen miles from the State University campus upon whom an honorary degree could be much more properly bestowed than upon the excellent young governor of this state. We have looked in vain for the names of Dr. J. B. Briney or Dr. J. H. O. Smith among the recipients of any marks of esteem from our own colleges at this degree giving season. Is this just another indication of the fallibility of the wise men of the colleges? And yet, sometimes some colleges do pick out the right man—even colleges of little repute.

That is where the trouble in England now is. John Clifford and Charles Aked, two of the most prominent of British preachers, have been strangely overlooked by American institutions of renown. No degree that Harvard has ever conferred has been more worthily earned than one that might be given to John Clifford. He has, by hard study, won the M. A., B. Sc. and LL. B., at the University of London, representing over ten years of steady university work and examinations. Yet, because Bates' College gave him a D. D., which, we may say from personal knowledge, Dr. Clifford himself never uses, some of his political opponents are trying to discredit Dr. Clifford by reason of this degree from a college hardly known in England. Dr. Clifford is easily the most prominent figure in the British religious world.

Mr. Aked, not a scholar, but a preacher whose abilities have forced him to the front rank, received a "D. D." from Temple College, Philadelphia. Instead of accepting the inevitable gracefully Mr. Aked, after acknowledging the degree and using it, had qualms of conscience, which worked on his whole system in such a way that he finally cast off the title. And yet Mr. Aked is far more worthy of the honor than many a man who receives it from an institution of standing. There is no reason why a reputable institution of learning may not give public recognition to men who have done something notable for the world, especially when they are college bred or of wide literary culture. But there needs to be more discrimination on the part of college authorities. It is just as true that no man of reputation would feel honored except an institution of the best repute was behind any honor bestowed.

Editor's Easy Chair.

The Easy Chair is convinced that there is an unconscious skepticism that is far more universal in its extent and subtle in its operations than any conscious infidelity that may exist. It may be doubted whether most of us accept, at their full value and meaning, many of the statements of Scripture which we constantly use. For instance, we quote as one of our favorite texts, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God," and straightway we seek first, either our personal interests or what we regard as our party or denominational interests, making the kingdom of God a subordinate consideration. If the religious world should "seek first the kingdom of God," then every religious body would regard itself as existing simply for the advancement of the kingdom of God, and its one question, concerning every action and movement, would be, "Will this tend to promote the interests of God's kingdom on earth?" But is that true? Do we indeed subordinate all party interests and party pride to the welfare of the kingdom? Perhaps the most fundamental mistake which religious people have made in the past has been the exaltation of denominational interests above those of the kingdom of God. Do we really believe, then, that the thing of first importance with every individual Christian and with every local church, and with every religious body is the kingdom of God and its righteousness? If we are to judge men's faith by their actions are we not compelled to the conclusion that there is a good deal of latent skepticism in the church as to the primacy of the kingdom of God? We submit this question as worthy of the serious consideration of all who accept the supremacy of Christ and profess to make his teaching the rule of their lives.

Let us take another inspired statement about which there is probably even more unconscious skepticism than about the former. In enumerating the things which abide, Paul mentions faith, hope and love, and says "the greatest of these is love." Do we believe that? Do we act like we believed it? Would not the passage conform more to our real practice if it read, "Now abideth faith, hope and accuracy in theological thinking, and the greatest of these is theological accuracy?" Let us suppose two men, one of whom is characterized by his love to God and men. The law of kindness is in his tongue and his hands are outstretched to relieve the wants of the needy, but he is known to be "unsound," as the phrase goes, in some of his theological opinions, though he holds to Christ with steadfast devotion. The other man is skilled in argument, and has a reputation for great "soundness in the faith," though his heart is as loveless as a stone. Which of the twain would have the better standing—the man that loves most or the man that debates most? We make much of the phrase "sound in the faith," but how seldom we quote the other Scripture, "sound in love!" It is not our purpose, by any means, to discredit accuracy in theological thinking, but rather to magnify the supremacy of love. If we should give it its rightful place at the very head of the Christian virtues it would revolutionize our religious estimates, widen the circle of our Christian fellowship, and put us well forward on the road to Christian unity. If we believe in New Testament Christianity let us exalt love to its rightful and original place. Heresy of the heart is far worse, in the sight of God, than heresy of the head. Indeed, all real heresies emanate from the heart. "Out of the heart are the issues of life."

Why is love greatest? Evidently because it is the greatest force with which to do God's work in the world. It fulfils the law. Nothing else does. All the law and the prophets hang on love—Godward and manward. The law and the prophets had for their ultimate end the bringing about of right relations between God and man, and between man and man. Love is the only force that accomplishes this end. God wants his Church edified. Love edifies. He wants his Church united. Love unites. He wants the world evangelized. Love evangelizes. He wants us to bear each other's burdens. Love is a burden-bearer for others. He wants all wars throughout the earth to cease and men to live together in peace. Love is the great peacemaker. He wants the fatherless and the homeless cared for, the widows visited in their affliction, the sorrowing comforted, and the poor to have the Gospel preached to them. Love is evermore reaching out helpful hands to the poor and the needy, binding up broken hearts, wiping tears from the eyes of Sorrow and pouring its wealth of affection upon friendless childhood and desolate old age, which would otherwise be unloved and uncared for. Love is the cohesive power in the family, in the church and in the society without which the social bonds would be disrupted and strife and confusion usurp the place of peace and order. He serveth best who loveth most. That church, or religious body, that is most dominated by love is most united within itself and with God, and has attained to the highest excellence in Christian life. Beloved, here is our standard. Let us emulate each other in loving, until this shall become our distinguishing mark, and men shall say of us, as they said of the disciples of old, "Behold, how they love one another!"

En route. Billowy plains of ripened wheat, ripening oats and growing corn, dotted with comfortable farm houses, green meadows, grazing herds, all passing in swift panoramic view as the train rushes on—that is Illinois to-day. It requires only the historic imagination to see what was once here—a vast inland sea—Lake Michigan continued—tenanted by such monsters of the deep as inhabited these fresh water seas in prehistoric times. Then, after how many millenniums we know not, the dry land appeared and much later came man, savages first, and afterwards civilized man. He proved to be a farmer and tilled the soil, and his tribe multiplied and the wilderness was subdued, and cities were built, and school houses and churches were erected, and from its soil sprang into the national arena such men as Abraham Lincoln, Stephen A. Douglas and Ulysses S. Grant. What an evolution was that—from the low swampy marsh at the mouth of the sluggish stream that flowed into Lake Michigan at the southern end of it, to Chicago, and from the reptiles of primeval slime to Abraham Lincoln! An evolution we have called it, but not by "resident forces" altogether, but by the coming hither of a higher type of life and civilization, which, by utilizing natural resources, has developed what Illinois has been and is. Now here is the southern border of the present Lake Michigan, and shying away from Chicago to the east we pass up the eastern shore of the lake through many popular resorts and pause for a few hours at our first love of all the east side resorts—Macatawa Park.

In our brief stop-over at Macatawa we had the pleasure of greeting the Haleys, Hallacks, Rogers, Hollands, Combs, Clarks and Weeks; take down the shutters from "Edgewood-on-the-Lake," take in the wondrous sweep of vision from its upper veranda, including a storm-cloud approaching majestically over the watery plain, and hasten on to our train to continue our journey to the north. It seemed a great pity to break away from the association of such good people as we met there, and we indulge the hope that some of them, at least, may join the Pentwater colony of Disciples. T. P. Haley and George H. Combs were in neglige attire, so that their churches would hardly know them. Let them come up to Pentwater and we will theologize and ichthyologize by turns. There is a very close connection between these two sciences. One of the greatest revelations which the original disciples of Jesus ever had concerning his divinity, came to them while they were fishing. And is it not remarkable that when Jesus selected his apostles he chose so many fishermen? But hark! What sound is that which greets our ears? It is the roar of the surf on the beach at "Garrison Park," Pentwater. Here we are at last. "The Pioneer"—our humble cottage—seems as glad to see us as we to see it. The trees we love so much are nodding us a hearty welcome, and the waves are clapping their hands in joy! That is all there is to welcome us, as we are the first arrivals of the season, either at "Garrison Park" or our near neighbor, the "Oceana Beach" resort. The season here does not open, very widely at least, until after the glorious Fourth. We have not yet had time to open the cottage, as I am hastily penning these lines to get them away on the next mail train on this the last day of June. We notice a distinct change of temperature here and have already donned heavier clothing. We have just heard the whistle of "The Kansas," the steamer from Chicago, which is just making its first tri-weekly trip. Concerning all these things, more anon.

Our Colleges and Foreign Missions

By Archibald McLean

President of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

The first need of the mission field is the need of a sufficient number of thoroughly equipped men. No other need is comparable with this. Money is needful, and money is hard to get, but not so hard as men of the right kind. Money can be had if suitable men are ready for the service.

It is to the colleges that the society must look for men. What West Point does for the army, and what Annapolis does for the navy, our colleges must do for foreign missions. To be sure now and then a man may be sent who has not been to college. He may be a man of extraordinary ability. He may, by sheer force of intellect have acquired the education necessary, but men of that sort are very rare, and they would be none the worse, but all the better, for a collegiate education. In any case it is to the colleges that the societies must look for a steady supply of men. They can come from no other source.

In the early years of the present missionary era, mechanics and farmers were sent out in large numbers. No others were ready to go. Men trained in the colleges preferred to remain at home. It is not so now, men of ability and education are called for more and more, and they are responding, "Here am I, send me." The fields need such men. Most of the work done in the early period was done among savage and illiterate people. The missionaries now go to the people who have great schools and high educational ideals. These people must be addressed by men of culture and refinement if much good is to be done. The missionaries have to do with government officials and military officers, travelers and merchants. They should be men of broad and generous culture in order to favorably impress such people as they meet.

Pastors and evangelists and other helpers must be trained for the work. This can not be done by men of limited or no education. Wise master-builders are needed to lay foundations upon which others shall build. They are needed to train those who shall go out in the name of the Lord to preach the Gospel of his grace and glory to their own countrymen.

In most, if not all, of our schools, mission study classes are taught. In nearly every school there is a band of volunteers. The students meet once a week or once in two weeks to pray about the fields, to pray for the workers, and to prepare themselves in mind and heart for the service. In some of our schools missions are a part of the curriculum. This subject is taught as church history or exegesis is taught. Missions are having a larger place constantly in our colleges. This is one of the hopeful signs of the times.

Our Colleges and Home Missions

By Geo. B. Ranshaw

Field Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society.

At the recent Texas convention addresses were made by the representatives of the various organized agencies through which we are endeavoring to do the Lord's work. Bro. Stephen J. Corey, with inimitable and convincing charm, showed how impossible it is for a congregation to live unless it have the spirit of missions, and unless, fired with enthusiasm for the Christ and the world, it send far and near its cheering, healing help. Immediately following him came Charles A. Finch, the successful pastor of the church at Topeka, presenting the cause of church extension. In an admirable address he proved how utterly impossible it would be to have a congregation to enthuse upon the subject of foreign missions without the help of the board of church extension, to gather into a nucleus under one roof the individuals that compose the effective congregation. Following this conviction so deeply driven home to the hearts of the most appreciative and responsive convention within our ranks, the representative of the American Christian Missionary Society boldly declared that unless the home missionary board sent out its faithful skirmishers, preaching the Gospel and gathering together the inarticulated elements, combining them skillfully into dynamic forces, there would be no need of church extension loans and no possibility of foreign missionary interest in a given locality. So that underneath all the work we are endeavoring to do, in a very essential way, is the work popularly spoken of as home missions. It seemed to be sound logic and the convention cheered the argument and endorsed the conclusion. But T. E. Shirley, of Texas Christian University, presently arose to speak on Christian Education. Alluding to the addresses just mentioned, he said: "I agree with them all, and especially with the last one, which convincingly presented home missions as the foundation of all our co-operative work. But I would like to ask Brother Ranshaw where he is going to get the preacher who is to preach to those scattered people and bring them into effective union and relationship with the great brotherhood of workers, unless our colleges train up our young men for this work? Home missions is the foundation, but education is the bedrock." And this is the conclusion which experience in home missionary work forces upon every man.

Home missionary work is the vitally essential work before the church of Christ to-day, for, obviously upon it rests the development of the church, the future of the nation, and destiny of the world. A work so fundamentally important demands men of trained abilities. There was a time when the uneducated preacher could do effective evangelistic work and could give great aid in rapidly extending the borders of the kingdom. But that day has passed. Schools, colleges, newspapers, magazines, Chautauqua courses, libraries, interurban and transcontinental communication, have so broadened the culture, developed the capabilities, energized the minds and inspired the purposes of men, that the demand for an educated ministry comes with as much insistence from the firing line on the frontier as from the city centers. The untrained preacher, like the untrained mechanic, is relegated to secondary operations and reduced to the minimum wage. The most frequent complaints that reach our office are those which have their just lodgment against men who essay to fill positions for which they are ill qualified. Such men have, now and then, set back a hopeful missionary work a whole decade, and by their unwise conduct and illiterate speech have not infrequently repelled the very people whom they sought to reach.

The city becomes more and more the point of strategy in the conquest of the world. Trained men only can enter the cities, maintain the cause against the myriad antagonisms that here assail, compel attention from the world-distraught, set high the standard of the cross and by it conquer.

The difference between the skilled cabinet maker and the wheeler of sawdust in the pit is one of training. The one has skill and knowledge of tools, appreciation of proportion, initiative and inventive genius. He is not confined to a single round of employment of mind or body. He devises, builds, improves upon each piece of workmanship, and blesses thus his fellowmen while bettering himself. The wheeler in the pit toils in the rut of a single wheel day after day. His lack of training limits his usefulness. The difference is even greater between the trained and the untrained preacher. As we view the field of battle at every point we see the need of trained and seasoned men, we hear the call for leaders, well equipped and ready for the keenest problems of the day. The hope of the future in home missions is in our colleges.

Our Debt to Our Colleges

By J. G. Waggoner

Field Secretary of Eureka College.

"I am debtor both to the Greeks and barbarians. * * I am ready to preach."—Paul.

"Never was there such a demand for competent preachers of the Gospel."—D. R. Dungan.

"In the Christian colleges rests our hope of greater victories in evangelism. * * * Help the college if you would speed the world's evangelization."—W. J. Wright.

"The demand of the hour is educated men in the pulpit. * * One of the most potent methods of preaching the Gospel is by the support of the colleges where Christ is honored and his truth is taught."—Judge C. J. Scofield.

"First among the agencies for spreading the Gospel is the preacher, and first among the means of supplying the preachers is the Bible college."—W. F. Richardson.

"Our schools are our sources of pulpit supply. * * * Our schools and our faithful educators, to whom we owe immeasurable and unspeakable obligation, and whose work is the essential basis of all our enterprises and all our successes, receive scant attention."—F. D. Power.

"One thousand dollars brings $50 a year to the college which enables one student to graduate each year. If he preaches twenty years, he ought to add 1,000 members, put $10,000 into church property and $2,000 into missions. What better can $1,000 do?"—Gen. F. M. Drake.

Salvation being the gift of God does not release the receiver from obligation, but intensifies it. Therefore Paul's "debt" and ours—Paul's obligation expressed itself in passing the blessing on to others, so must ours. Our debt to our colleges arises from their contribution to preaching the Gospel.

If we appreciate the invaluable services rendered the church and the world by the great army of mighty men and leaders which our colleges have trained to preach the Gospel, if we appreciate the "unspeakable sacrifices" of our educators to produce such men, then we owe our colleges an everlasting debt of appreciation and gratitude.

If the college fills a difficult and a trying place, where selfish, or designing men may ruin the prospects and possibilities of young men by unfaithfulness, or pernicious doctrine, if our teachers and trustees need wisdom from on high, that they may train our young men to be mighty men of God, declaring his whole counsel, preaching his word faithfully, then we owe our colleges our most sincere and devout prayers to God to give grace and wisdom.

If the great truths and principles for which we stand are worthy to be occupied and promoted by our children; if our children are to be worthy and competent to be the leaders of the world's moral and spiritual life, then we owe them the opportunity of moral and spiritual training in colleges which give attention to these things. If we look to our colleges for leaders in divine things, ministers, leaders and missionaries for the world's life, then we owe the colleges the best material, our children, our patronage.

If the Christian college is at the basis of our progress, if every additional well trained minister adds strength and power to every department of our growth, if the foreign fields depend on our colleges for men and women, if every phase of home work is made stronger by the better educated, and better trained ministry, if all our children in whatever profession are made stronger in moral and spiritual life by being educated of our colleges, then we owe these institutions our financial support. If tuition pays only half the expenses of conducting colleges, as it does, and if every church and every Christian has better services and a better ministry because of our Christian colleges then we owe them our financial support. No Christian should be satisfied until, according to his ability, he has made a liberal donation in money, or annuity, or deed to property, or has put a bequest in his will to our colleges that have done so much for the kingdom of God in the past and on which so much depends for the future.

Education Day and How to Observe It

By W. P. Aylsworth

President of Cotner University.

Great advantage attaches to uniform and concerted action in any important task. Some of us who were brought up in the woods remember the eventful days when a whole neighborhood came together to do what a few could not possibly have done. The shout and rhythm of action, as willing hands raised huge beams to their places in the heavy framework had much to do with success.

Just such enthusiasm and unity of effort are needed in the observance of education day. To arouse interest and overcome inertia can not be accomplished by a few; it should be the work of a whole brotherhood. The lifting of our educational interests to the proper place in our organized work as a people is the duty of the hour. It is not too early to think it over and make some resolutions.

1. Resolve that without fail the cause shall be presented if possible on the day appointed. If not then as soon as possible afterward. It is not easy to make good such a resolve under some circumstances. Other things, even less important, crowd it out. The pastor will be advised to omit it "this time." Interest is lukewarm or courage fails and the opportunity to help our most needy cause goes over. Such is the case with a large number of our churches if returns are sure indications. Only through the ministry can the people be reached. What has been true of our missionary appeals is true of the cause of Christian education. Too often the people are more willing to help than we think. At any rate a duty is laid upon the ministry which can not be put aside without an almost criminal participation in defeat and failure of a great cause.

2. Present the facts in the case. Show how vital is the success of our schools to all other departments of Christian effort. Study the map, see how the communities of the brotherhood most populous and best organized have in their very heart school centers. Study history. See how all enduring reforms have sprung from centers of learning. The restoration movement is not an exception unless in its greater need of the strength and freedom of intelligence. Study our needs. The old guard of the ministry is passing away. Who shall fill their places in the harvest fields of humanity? Can we hope that the great secular and industrial schools will suffice to furnish trained and enthused workers? At least the initiative must be taken in the environment of Christian training or our brightest youth will be turned away from the spirit of sacrifice essential to success. Listen to the calls from empty pulpits and destitute mission fields. With such a preparation your observance of education day can not fail to arouse interest.

3. Present the bright side. We dwell upon discouragements too much. Difficulties and failures should be presented that our needs may be seen, but it is possible to dwell so much on the dark side that no courage remains to help it. The fact remains that at tremendous odds our schools are doing a great work and are steadily gaining in influence and power. Let it be understood that to help on this work is to lend a hand to a winning cause. Consecrated money can find no safer or better investment. A better day is dawning for this much neglected part of our organized effort if all who can will lend a hand in a united effort to lift the burden.

4. Let the urgent need of this work be subject of prayer. May God help us each one to do his duty in presenting this paramount need as it has never been presented before.

Our Colleges and Evangelism

By WM. J. WRIGHT
National Supt. of Evangelism

So far as the ministry is concerned, the college measurably takes the place of our Master in the training of the twelve. Its function is to take all possible things of God—in earth, in the universe, in man and in the book—and make them the property of the embryo preacher. Further, it is to show him the best methods of applying all truth and is to train and direct him in the application.

Evangelism is the process of making known to men God's purpose and plan for men, both for this world and life, and for the future and unseen. But this knowledge is not imparted simply that men may not be ignorant. The objective is to "turn them from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God;" to bring them to immediate, hearty and constant harmony and co-operation with God in making his purpose and plan operative and universal among men.

The college views all truth as being God's. It therefore rightly considers him who is in possession of the greatest measure of truth, with which his own life is consistent, best qualified to make God known to men, and best equipped to persuade them to commit their ways to him; to delight themselves also in the Lord in order that he may give them the desires of their hearts. The college stands for the best methods of acquiring and applying truth. Possibly this should be affirmed mainly of the truth which is commonly reckoned as not being vital to religion; for the possession and application of religious truth has not been as fully or scientifically treated in our colleges as its merits demand. Or, if religious truth has been satisfactorily imparted to young preachers by our colleges, the best methods of applying this truth to other lives, and winning them to the service of the Lord, have been much neglected.

It is a common thing for preachers to be graduated from our colleges in almost absolute ignorance of the work of evangelism. Not only are many of them uninformed as to the thousand niceties which make the pastoral duties and public meetings smooth and attractive; but—and it is a thousand times more important—they are untaught and untrained in the fundamentals of evangelism. If a man be awkward, embarrassed, boorish in pastoral calling, pulpit ministration, performing the marriage ceremony or administering Christian baptism, he may be simply ludicrous or ridiculous; but if he does not know how to make his sermons evangelistic, flashing with convicting and throbbing with enticing and wooing notes, then he is out of place, pitiable; and he or his teachers, criminal. The college has failed to equip him for his most important task. It has not discovered and trained his latent powers for winning men to God. It has given truth but not spirit and method; it has made a scholar perhaps, but not an evangelist.

I once made a list of 57 words mispronounced by an evangelist in a single sermon, and even then the list was incomplete. An evangelist of national reputation, recently and repeatedly made three syllables of the word "microbes." Another says that "men have saw more than Moses seen when he clumb the mount and seen the Promised Land." Such talk is a rock of offence; yet the men who use it wield well the Spirit's sword and win vast throngs to God. On the other hand, here is a man whose knowledge is of wide range and deep; whose words are sweeter than honey, for pronunciation; grammar and rhetoric are all but faultless, but he does not make me see myself as I appear before God; he does not let me see Jesus. His sermons are "icily regular, splendidly null, dead perfection; no more." The former man offends my ear; the latter rives my heart. The former preaching is an offence to learning and culture; the latter is an insult to the high calling of the evangelist and an affront to God.

The best college, then, is the one which trains the brain and fires the heart; which fits a man not simply for acceptable public speech, in edifying saints, but which stamps indelibly upon his soul the vision of the lost, gives egress and direction to the fire once shut up within his bones, but which now breaks out and kindles like fires in countless other lives.

"Till every kindred, every tribe
On this terrestrial ball,
To Him all majesty ascribe,
And crown Him Lord of all."

Let this be the program in our colleges: make our young preachers evangelistic. Our national board of evangelism, in order to bring this to pass, extends herein to all our colleges a helping hand. The evangelistic institutes and schools of evangelism which we conduct will give your students new ideas of the ministry, and will influence their preaching for many years.

If you can use us we are "your servants for Jesus' sake," in all matters pertaining to "our colleges and evangelism."

CHAPTER VII.

Brother Piano-Tuner Reviewed.

In the manner of Brother Lawyer, when he came to review Brother Piano-Tuner, there was, for once, none of the cocksureness of the great jurist laying down the law. He spoke, for the most part, musingly, hesitatingly, as if communing with his own soul rather than with his audience.

"Truthfulness," he said, "is a quality to make the man who possesses it respected in heaven and admired on earth. It is an essential part of a preacher's equipment, wanting which he must fail, though he speak with the tongues of men and of angels.

"Yet the people of Spinsterview, when they accused our brother of lying, were flagrantly unjust, whether they intended injustice or not. A charitable explanation of their conduct is that they were unable to distinguish between a falsehood and an erroneous prediction.

"We all utter prophecies at times, announcing them in such form that they seem like statements of fact; but if such of them as fail of fulfillment are to be accounted as lies, heaven help us all.

"'I shall die an old maid,' said a dear girl. She died at the age of 80, having buried two husbands, leaving behind her forty-three grandchildren and eleven great-grandchildren. A liar? No. She had uttered a prediction which lost its way amid a labyrinth of unforseeable conditions, and so could not arrive at fulfillment.

"'I shall never take another to fill the place made vacant by the death of my beloved,' said the heartbroken widower. Twenty years later he buried his third wife. His hasty announcement of perpetual widowerhood had not been made with intent to deceive. Looking with tear-blurred eyes into a future heavily shadowed, much obscured by flying cloud-rack, he had mistaken a blooming orange tree for a weeping willow. Byron's lady, who, 'swearing she would ne'er consent, consented,' was not a perjurer but a poor prophet. A lie is an untruth uttered with intent to deceive. 'When I said I would die a bachelor,' said Benedict, 'I did not think I should live till I were married.' That explanation secures Benedict from any condemnation for lying. When this witness declared he would die a bachelor, the declaration did not emanate from a heart deceitful and desperately wicked: it was merely a forecast of the future which turned out to be wrong. If bad augury is a sin, then many an almanac maker that I know is damned. Shall we, in this enlightened age, take the poor, discredited augur to the summit of the Tarpeian rock and cast him down headlong? That were absurd, illogical, and wasteful.

"This case of Brother P-T brings us face to face with one of the deep mysteries of this life. Why is it that when a preacher marries he must presently leave the place where matrimony overtakes him? The human intellect has seldom had to grapple with a more perplexing problem than this. When the man in the parable said, 'I have married a wife, and therefore I can not come,' the Master did not pretend to discover any essential connection between the fact of marriage and the Therefore; and I think no one has since discovered it. So, in our day, when a preacher says, 'I have married a wife, and therefore I had to go,' we are confronted with the same problem. We can not discover the

As Seen From the Dome

By F. D. Power

Our party from the start has had excellent health. The ten cases of the bubonic plague reported in Alexandria even cause no uneasiness. Our venerable Doctor Divinitatis from Denver made the Samaritan trip on horseback for three days, and the last day was eleven hours in the saddle, and had to be helped into the hotel, but he is as bright as a lark in Maytime. Our patriarchal church dedicator went down to Jericho and broke his carriage down four times and had to walk four miles in the rain but no camel can make quicker or longer strides, and he is in better condition than the poor fellow who fell among thieves on the same journey. Our man from Oklahoma went in both the Dead Sea and the Jordan in one day, something few men can do, however long unwashed, but he seems to have felt no inconvenience from his contact with much water and consequent loss of real estate. Our men Hester and Medbury ran considerable risk in rescuing a young calf on the highway to Jericho, and restoring it to the arms of the shepherd, but they seem to have recovered from their act of heroism. One of our ladies tried to see the walls of Jerusalem from the back of a donkey and has settled the question as to the location of the Holy Sepulchre by the impression that Jerusalem has no walls. All of the little party of Disciples with a big D, belonging to the Restoration movement with a capital R, I am glad to say, are in good condition after a somewhat trying trip. We reached Egypt in good shape on Wednesday, March 21, landing in Alexandria, and cheered by the crews of our warships in the harbor.

Egypt is a most interesting land. "Egypt," said Herodotus, "contains more wonders than any other land, and is pre-eminent above all the countries of the world." We are on the Nile. Like the Amazon, the Congo and Mississippi, it is one of the longest of the world's rivers, only fifty miles less than the Father of Waters, being 4,062 miles in length. It supplies the daily needs of ten millions of people, and their horses and cattle, for without it the Libyan and Arabian deserts would blot out all Egypt. All Egypt, its very civilization, its social and political order have been determined by the Nile, and Egypt is old. It has its ancient, its middle and its new empire. Its beginning is placed with the reign of Menes 5004 B. C. Its ancient empire closed before Abraham was born, the period to which belong the Pyramids, B. C. 5,000 to 3,250. The middle empire with its shepherd kings covers the period to 2,000 B. C. Its new empire gave the world Thothmes III. and the great Seti I., and his greater Son Rameses II., the Sesostris of the Greeks; and in the Museum of Cairo we see the faces of these giants who flourished 3,000 years ago. In Egypt time is reckoned not by centuries, but millenniums. The Pyramids are twice as old as the ten commandments, and when they were built, nearly 6,000 years ago, we are told Egypt had its written language, its grammar, its literature, its knowledge of mathematics and of the arts, its established hierarchy, and its social system. It worshipped the principle of life, hence the worship of the sacred bull, of the ibis, the crocodile, and the cat, and even the lotus. So Juvenal sang:

"O sacred nation whose gods grow in gardens!"

They believed in immortality and divided man into several elements that ultimately would be reunited and hence embalmed the body. Some one, skilled in figures, estimates the embalmed mummies in 4,700 years at 731,000,000. Egypt's architecture is massive. Temples and tombs are the notable examples. Cheops is a great tomb composed of 2,300,000 blocks of stone, each containing forty cubic feet. Cleopatra and Mark Antony, Joseph, Jacob and Abraham saw this Pyramid and the great Sphinx. Scores of volumes have been written to explain these monuments. These ancient people knew geometry and astronomy. They said: "The earth forms a part of the planetary system and is subject to the same law of motion," and in an inscription older than Abraham declared: "The earth navigates the celestial ocean in like manner with the sun and stars," and Ptah, they said: "moulded man, created the gods, made the sky, and formed the earth, revolving in space." With the discovery of the Rosetta stone now in the British museum, scholars learned all the riches of Egyptian literature carved upon monuments and written upon papyrus, and these ancient writings confirm the teaching of our Bible. Explorers have discovered the ruins of the treasure cities of Pharaoh, Pithom and Raamses, which Exodus tells us Israel built. It is declared, "The Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigour, and they made their lives bitter with hard bondage in mortar and in brick;" and while it was the custom of the Egyptians to lay brick in mud and not in mortar, it was found that the brick of Pithom was laid in mortar and not in mud. Straw was first furnished the Israelites to mix with their clay and then denied them and they had to collect "stubble" to mix with clay. These very bricks have come to light; the cellar walls of Pithom laid with brick mixed with chopped straw, and higher up, bricks made of clay mixed with "stubble," the reeds that still grow on the Nile; and then above them, bricks made of nothing but Nile mud! While Egypt is nominally subject to Turkey it is really self-governing. The Khedive, or King, is supposed to rule, but Great Britain administers the government as a trustee for the debts owing to her and to other nations. Lord Cromer is the real head. The international courts are composed of thirteen European powers and the United States. It has 400,000 square miles, and is a long oasis worn in the rocky desert by the ever-flowing Nile stream and varying from half a mile to fourteen miles in width. Under the Ptolemies we are told there were 25,000,000 people, now there are 10,000,000. Only twelve per cent can read and write. The Nile valley has about 13,000 square miles; 5,700,000 acres are under cultivation, and they raise three crops a year by irrigation. It is as rich as an Illinois prairie. There are 5,219,113 date palms which are in themselves a great treasure. Egypt is the gift of the Nile. The very name "Neilos" from nea ilus, "new mud," tells the story of its fertilizing properties. In Homeric days the Nile was called Aigyptos, a name afterward transferred to the country. The present ruler is Abbas Hilmi II, who became Khedive in '92 at the age of 18. He is well qualified, popular and content with one wife though the Koran allows him four. He has six children.

Alexandria was our first sight of Egypt. Alexander the Great intended this city to be the capital of the world. Alexandria was the home of Ptolemy, of the great Library, of Philo, the great philosopher, of Cleopatra, of Hypatia, of Apollos and Barnabas, and of Mark who wrote the second gospel of the Septuagint translation

WELL POSTED

A California Doctor With 40 Years Experience.

"In my 40 years' experience as a teacher and practitioner along hygienic lines," says a Los Angeles physician, "I have never found a food to compare with Grape-Nuts for the benefit of the general health of all classes of people. I have recommended Grape-Nuts for a number of years to patients with the greatest success and every year's experience makes me more enthusiastic regarding its use.

"I make it a rule to always recommend Grape-Nuts and Postum Food Coffee in place of coffee when giving my patients instructions as to diet for I know both Grape-Nuts and Postum can be digested by any one.

"As for myself, when engaged in much mental work my diet twice a day consists of Grape-Nuts and rich cream. I find it just the thing to build up gray matter and keep the brain in good working order.

"In addition to its wonderful effects as a brain and nerve food Grape-Nuts always keeps the digestive organs in perfect healthy tone. I carry it with me when I travel, otherwise I am almost certain to have trouble with my stomach." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Strong endorsements like the above from physicians all over the country have stamped Grape-Nuts the most scientific food in the world.

of the Old Testament used by him of whom it was said, "Out of Egypt have I called my son." It is a modern city of 320,000 people, 46,000 of whom are Europeans. It has its places of interest. One sees on entering the harbor of this great commercial port, on the left, the Phare or lighthouse, the direct descendant of the ancient Pharos which was nearly 600 feet high, illuminated at night with great fires to guide the ships, which was one of the seven wonders of the world; and one views on the right Pompey's Pillar, a shaft of red granite, 81 feet high, the twin of Cleopatra's Needle, which has no more connection with Caesar's rival than the shaft in Central Park has with the Egyptian sorceress. It is a singularly striking monument not unlike the Nelson Column in Trafalgar Square, London. The city is a hybrid. It has had a mushroom growth compared to the Old Alexandria, or the dead cities of the Nile Valley, Heliopolis, Memphis, Thebes, Karnak, Luxor, or Dendera. We think of Mark's Gospel, and Athanasius thundering against the Arians, and Cleopatra, "conqueror of the world's conquerors," and Kingsley's Hypatia. We think of it as the entrance to the Egypt of the Pharaoh's and of the Bible, of the Caliphates, and of the Arabian Nights. We think of it as the spot where we first view the great river whose delta, the seven mouths of the Nile, spread out like a seven-ribbed fan, pictures a green robe interwoven with silver threads—green fields of wheat and barley, of melons and cucumbers, of peas and grasses interspersed with palm groves and white minarets and intersected with canals and trenches with dahabiehs and giassas with their lateen sails apparently moving through the land. We think of Caliph Omar and the Great Library and his fallacious epigram: "If these writings agree with the Book of God they are useless, and need not be preserved; if they disagree, they are pernicious. In either case, let them be destroyed"; and the 300,000 parchments supplied fuel for the 4,000 baths of Alexandria. We think of the battle in which Octavius defeated the army of Antony near by, and gained for Rome a new empire; of the struggle near the same spot between 12,000 Britons and an equal number of French under Napoleon which gave the death blow to Napoleon's scheme of founding an eastern empire and converting the Mediterranean into a "French lake"; and of that greater conflict at Aboukir Bay, August 1, 1798, when Nelson met Brueys, and they illuminated the night by the incessant discharge of 2,000 cannon and the flames of burning French ships, and India was saved on the shores of Egypt. We think of the famous Rosetta stone, found near here, which furnished the key sought by archaeological students and Egyptologists for years to the hieroglyphic writings of this old land. We think finally of that "bridge of water" with which from Sesostris down men sought to span the Isthmus at last achieved by one heroic man, De Lesseps. Such thoughts come to us as we set foot on this shore.

relation between the wedding and the Therefore. There must be a lost premise in the formula by which the conclusion is reached; there must be an undiscoverable cog in the intellectual machinery that grinds out for us that particular grist of information; there must be a mysterious, invisible span in the bridge across the logical gulf between the fact of matrimony and the resultant hegira of the happy pair to fresh fields and pastures new.

"It is curious to observe how great intellects have fought shy of this problem. Darwin may have neglected it because it belongs to the domain of the metaphysical rather than to the physical. Huxley, Herbert Spencer, Jeremy Bentham, John Stuart Mill, Haeckel and Draper, maintain a silence on this theme that is almost cowardly, if not entirely criminal. Carlyle, Emerson and Immanuel Kant ignore it altogether. One might suppose that Swedenborg, who made a number of excusions into the Great Beyond, might have 'met-up' with something, over there, to elucidate this problem; if he did he failed to mention it. It is reasonable to believe, think you, that these great ones have not noticed a phenomenon so frequent and so singularly interesting? That were a poor compliment to their powers of discernment. Just between ourselves, they have been afraid to tackle it. Smart men do not like to be 'up the stump' (as the janitor might express it), any better than the rest of us. Therefore, they have thrown this puzzle into the intellectual scrap-heap, along with the problems of squaring the circle, perpetual motion, and the fourth dimension.

"I wish I could explain the thing myself. If I could I would, no matter what it might cost me.

"We are next to hear from Brother Paper-Hanger."

Education at the Missouri Convention.

The educational session at the recent Missouri State Convention was not a prolonged one. President Carl Johann, in making the report of the Students' Aid Fund, said that the great percentage of the men who died in the war was through lack of knowledge and preparation on the part of leaders. The churches, he said, must not make the same mistake, but provide competent leaders for the work which they have to do. He dwelt on the insignificant amount of money which is provided for this purpose. All the money that has been spent for educational institutions will not meet the cost of a single battleship, and one battleship's maintenance a year would cost more than all our schools cost. The price of one torpedo would be more than is expended for a whole year in the maintenance of Christian University, of which he was the president.

Ralph Lozier, of Carrollton, made a brilliant and telling speech on behalf of education. He asked the ministers to rise, and some thirty or forty who had not departed for their homes did so. "Is this the Missouri Education Society?" asked Mr. Lozier. And he went on to say how derelict we have been in our real duties, though we pride ourselves on our strength as a people, and on the fact that we have the true plea. No religious body, he said, that failed to make adequate provision for its ministry can hope to dominate the religion of the future. So well received was the address that it was voted that it should be put into print.

J. B. Jones made a motion that an endowment fund of $5,000 be made between now and the next annual convention, and he started it with a subscription of one hundred dollars.

W. J. Lhamon, dean of the Bible college, who usually makes a report of general education in the state, asked that the reading of the full report be dispensed with, owing to the lateness of the hour, and he merely read a portion of it on the resolutions, which recommended to the confidence, patronage and financial help of the brotherhood Christian College, Columbia; Christian College, Dexter; Missouri Christian College, Campden Point; William Woods College, Fulton; Christian University, Canton, and the Missouri Bible College, Columbia. Another resolution was passed recommending Dexter Christian College to the National C. W. B. M. for such consideration and support as may seem wise to that organization. The reports of the individual colleges will be found on other pages.

CLEVER DOCTOR

Cured a Twenty Years Trouble Without any Medicine.

A wise Indiana physician cured 20 years stomach disease without any medicine as his patient tells:

"I had stomach trouble for 20 years, tried allopathic medicines, patent medicines and all the simple remedies suggested by my friends but grew worse all the time.

"Finally a doctor who is the most prominent physician in this part of the state told me medicine would do me no good only irritating my stomach and making it worse—that I must look to diet and quit drinking coffee.

"I cried out in alarm, 'Quit drinking coffee!' why, 'What will I drink?'

"'Try Postum,' said the doctor, 'I drink it and you will like it when it is made according to directions, with cream, for it is delicious and has none of the bad effects coffee has.'

"Well that was two years ago and I am still drinking Postum. My stomach is right again and I know Doctor hit the nail on the head when he decided coffee was the cause of all my trouble. I only wish I had quit it years ago and drank Postum in its place." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Never too late to mend. Ten days trial of Postum in place of coffee works wonders. There's a reason.

Our Budget

—Wanted: Attention to our colleges.

—Wanted: The brainiest and best young men for the ministry.

—Wanted: More skilled physicians for an abundance of sick churches.

—Wanted: Our religious papers to support Education Day. Name those that are giving special space to our educational interests? The Christian-Evangelist is easily first and "The Christian Century" second. "Silence is sinful when to speak is a duty."

—We present in this annual mid-summer Education Number a view of the work and the needs of the principal colleges and schools under the control of the Disciples of Christ in the United States. No cause among us is so neglected in comparison with its importance as our school interests. Read the testimony of McLean, Ranshaw, Wright, men at the head of our national societies.

—The Editor-in-Chief escaped from St. Louis just in time to avoid some of the extreme heat. For some time he will send "copy" from Garrison Park, Pentwater, Mich.

—May we again request our subscribers to address their communications that are not strictly personal "To the Editor," and not to J. H. Garrison or Paul Moore, or any individual. The various members of the staff are frequently absent from the office on special business and items that should receive immediate attention are delayed or perhaps lost, through being sent to an individual who may be a thousand miles from The Christian-Evangelist office.

—Looking over the matter we have on hand, we find a good deal of material on the subject of federation that might well claim place if the discussion were to continue, but in view of the fact that we have decided for the present to close the discussion we are sure these brethren will understand why their contributions are omitted.

—C. E. Smith, who has done a good work at Charleston, S. C., will make his headquarters at St. Stephens. Marcellus Ely has succeeded him.

—Dr. Thomas B. McCartney, assistant professor in Greek at Kentucky University, will spend a month in Virginia as a lecturer and instructor in the State School for Teachers.

are investments for time and for eternity.

Place any amount with us, from fifty dollars up. We will issue a bond in legal form, guaranteeing interest at the rate of five or six per cent according to age, until your death. The money will then be used in Preaching the Gospel in America.

THE AMERICAN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY,
Y. M. C. A. BUILDING,
CINCINNATI, OHIO.

—F. W. Allen, the young pastor at Odessa, Mo., who recently passed through this city on his return bridal tour, announced that the church at Cairo, Ill., for which he preached in passing, is in need of a pastor and will be glad to secure the right man.

—W. P. Keeler writes us that churches might with advantage arrange for an entertainment in the form of an illustrated lecture on Gladstone, given by M. O. Naramore, with musical setting by his wife. The lecture has just been enjoyed by the church at Englewood, Chicago.

—We regret to learn that Harold Bell Wright has been ill with a slight attack of malaria. The total amount raised as a result of the "missionary week" held by the church at Lebanon, Mo., was $260, so that all the missionary and benevolent interests have been remembered. This church finds this way of raising money for missions the best it has tried.

Unsweetened Condensed Milk.

Peerless Brand Evaporated Cream is ideal milk, collected under perfect sanitary conditions, condensed in vacuo to the consistency of cream, preserved by sterilization only. Suitable for any modification and adapted to all purposes where milk or cream is required.

—Harold H. Griffis has just been ordained to the ministry by the church at Middletown, Ind. He was the valedictorian of this year's class at the Bible college, Lexington. L. E. Murray predicts for him a fruitful ministry. He was to begin work at Kalispell, Mont., July 1.

—John L. Rose writes us from Atchison, Kan., that they were just starting a big meeting. Brother Scoville was to be on hand in a few days, and Brother Kendall was already there. The tabernacle will seat two thousand.

—The Sunday-school at Watonga, Okla., has not observed children's day for many years until this year. F. Douglas Wharton is now the pastor, and he makes it a point to take all missionary offerings. More than the apportionment was raised and the school is rejoicing. D. J. Martz is the superintendent.

—W. E. M. Hackelman, during six months in the field, has been in meetings at Cincinnati, Lexington, Washington, Georgetown, Ky.; Worcester, Ohio; Philadelphia and New York city, wherein there were 537 accessions. He is to be associated with Herbert Yeuell at Union City, Tenn., where J. T. Castlebury is pastor, September 1.

—Among those spending the summer for special work at Chicago University are C. H. Winders, pastor at Columbia, Mo.; R. H. Newton, pastor at Normal, Ill.; Prof. A. D. Veatch and Prof. Walter Stairs, of Drake University; Richard Gentry, of Sedalia, Mo., who has been studying at Union Theological Seminary, and Professor Emberson, of the Missouri State Normal School, Kirksville, Mo.

—Charles Reign Scoville is to begin a union revival at Monroe, Wis., August 1, which will probably continue one month. The Monroe Ministerial Association has secured the use of the armory, the largest auditorium in the city. It will be remembered that J. H. Berkey is pastor of the Union Church in Christ, and he desires the prayers of the brotherhood in behalf of this meeting.

—The latest report we have received from N. M. Perry as to the condition of J. G. Creason is that this brother, who has been seriously ill for five months, was, upon the advice of a Kansas City physician, removed from Lathrop to the home of his mother in Kansas City. His condition is still critical. His family, who are still with him, and the congregation at Lathrop, ask the continued prayers of the brotherhood.

—The Island Church, Wheeling, W. Va., is in the most prosperous condition in its history. It raised more money, had more additions and larger audiences than in any other year. C. Manley Rice, the minister, has been granted a month's vacation. The "Wheeling News" makes the following editorial comment: "Dr. Rice's sermons have proved invaluable to 'The News.' Few departments of any Sunday paper have won such general approbation."

—"It seems so strange to me that so few young men are preparing themselves for the ministry. There is no profession in which there is so much room at the top. The demand for competent and consecrated ministers is far greater than the supply and is steadily increasing. I am satisfied that, if we could graduate one hundred ministers every year instead of eight or ten, all of them would be engaged for permanent work before their last school year had closed."—President Carl Johann.

—Bro. A. J. Bush, the financial agent of the Juliet Fowler Home, Station A, Dallas, Texas, writes us: "The problem before us now is a house for the boys. Our lease on the building now in use runs out January 1, 1907. We must have a place for these twenty-five little boys before we have to vacate the house in which they now live." We hope the brethren of the southwest will respond to this appeal. During the present year the running expenses of the home have been paid, and $5,600 on the land. There are sixty happy, healthy children in the home, but there is no room for other applicants.

—A note from Bro. W. C. MacDougall, St. Thomas, Ont., informs us that he will sail on the Pretorian, of the Allan line, on July 11. He expects to remain in Scotland and England until the second week of September, the month of August to be spent at the "Summer Meeting" in Cambridge. The latter part of September will be spent in Palestine, and he will sail from Port Said for Bombay the first week of October, and from Bombay to Calcutta. Our esteemed brother will be followed by the prayers and best wishes of his host of friends in the United States and Canada for a safe journey and for the prosperity of his mission.

—A. K. Wright, of California, has received a call to the church recently established by George C. Ritchey at Meridian, Idaho. As a result of the latter's meeting thirty-three charter members organized themselves and at the close of the meeting the membership was sixty-three, with a Bible school of forty-five, a Christian Endeavor of twenty-seven members and a lot secured for a church site. Bro. L. K. Dick, in sending us these particulars, says: "We heartily thank God for our success, as there were several of us who had carried our church letters in our trunks for years, and we were nearly starved out. We feel now that we will be a wide-awake church."

—The last copy of "La Via de Paz" received says: "Just now things wear a little lonesome look around the mission. Brother and Sister Moses are in Saltillo, Brother Ireland, Miss Case and Miss Robertson in the States, and Monday Mrs. Cox, Mrs. Inman's mother, left for Fort Worth, Texas, to be at the bedside of Mrs. Kneeland, Brother Inman's aunt, who is very sick. * * * Brother Jimenez is rejoicing over the birth of a daughter. This is the third little one that has been added to our mission family in two months. Brother Enrique Westrup and Brother Arellano, being the proud fathers of the other two."

—After what seems to us many trials and tribulations, a pastor has been called to succeed Homer Wilson at the Central Christian Church, San Antonio, Texas. From time to time we have had reports of this minister or that receiving a call, but none of these reports seems to have resulted in a minister taking up the work definitely. We now understand that J. B. Cleaver has begun his labors with the church, and we trust the membership will unite in supporting his hands. No good can come from any division such as has been manifested. We are glad to know that the outlook is encouraging. Eight have taken membership during the last two Sundays, and Brother Furnish, who has been quite sick for over six months, was able to be present.

—Considering the obstacles to be overcome the work at Waukegan, Ill., where E. N. Tucker has just closed his second year, is a very successful one. During the past twelve months forty were added to the membership, which is now seventy-seven. The Bible school has 175 enrolled and has more than doubled in numbers. Endeavor societies have also been organized. A basement for a commodious church building has been erected at a cost of $5,000, and some $3,000 additional have been raised for other purposes. Brother Tucker has accepted a unanimous call for a term of five years, beginning August 1. T. B. Hutchison, an elder of the church, writes that he has greatly endeared himself to the congregation, and that it is largely through his untiring energy that the church has been able to accomplish what it has in Waukegan.

—H. F. Weimann, Hallsboro, Va., referring to the need of teaching converts, as well as making them, reminds us that, "There is only one book in the New Testament which deals with additions or numbers, and even this book deals more with the effectual working of the Holy Spirit than it does with numbers. Most of the books in the New Testament are devoted to the building up in Christ Jesus, or the saving of Christians, instead of saving heathens. Even Paul, in his letters to Timothy, does not ask him how many additions he has taken in, nor does he exhort him to look after the number, but he exhorts him first of all to live a godly Christian life himself, to endure hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, and show himself a workman that needeth not to be ashamed; and secondly, to teach these things to those under his charge." Our brother is right in urging as the great need among us to-day, more thoroughly equipped and trained preachers and teachers to build up our membership in spiritual life and practical Christian work, and this sentiment falls in well with the purpose of this education number.

—C. V. Kerr, the church clerk at Wellsville, N. Y., writes us officially as to the closing of the ministry of W. E. Adams for the Broad Street Church, after a period of two years and nine months. During his stay with this congregation there has been not only a marked growth in members, but also a substantial and gratifying growth in all the attributes which go to make up a happy and contented congregation. Brother Adams is an all-round, good minister, and leaves this community with the respect and good will of all. During the first half of the present year some forty names have been added to the church register, and the general condition of the church is such that the succeeding pastor will find a well organized and aggressive congregation. At his farewell service six were added to the membership, and the pastors of the Methodist, Baptist and Congregational churches united with Brother Adams as a voluntary tribute to the esteem of the various congregations, which filled the church to overflowing. On the following evening the members and friends met at the residence of one of the members to tender a farewell greeting. Brother Adams' new field of work is at Perry, Lake county, Ohio.

District Meeting.

The Missouri Second District is called in convention, beginning Monday night, July 16, and continuing through the two following days, at Sweet Springs. The church at that place cordially invites all their brethren to meet with them; the entertainment will be free. This district is composed of the following counties: Cass, Bates, Lafayette, Johnson, Henry, Saline, Pettis, Benton, Cooper, Morgan, Camden, Moniteau, Miller, Cole, Osage, Maries and Gasconade.

Let all the churches take notice and let all come together and pray and plan for great things. A good program has been prepared.—T. A. Abbottt, corresponding secretary; J. H. Hardin, Bible school superintendent.

Illinois—Sixth District

The sixth missionary district of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society met in annual convention with the Christian church at Farmer City, June 26, 27. The first afternoon and evening were given to the C. W. B. M. interests. Mrs. Sue Odor, of Decatur, presided; Miss Lura Thompson, of Carthage, and Mrs. Effie Cunningham, of Indianapolis, Ind., were the principal speakers. A good report was given of work done during the past year.

The second day was given entire to the missionary interests. The secretary was able to give a fine report of work done in the district during the past year. The year was closed with a balance to the credit of the district of about $180, a good nucleus for the work of the coming year. The principal addresses were made by the president, Harold E. Monser; F. W. Burnham, S. E. Fisher, Marion Stevenson and J. H. Gilliland. The old officers, L. H. Otto, president; J. H. Smart, vice president, and H. H. Peters, secretary, were succeeded by Finis Idleman, president; Charles Bloom, vice president, and S. Elwood Fisher, secretary. The convention is to meet next year with the church at Sullivan.

Golden Wedding.

If they live until July 13, Brother and Sister J. C. Powell, of Norman, Okla., will celebrate their golden wedding. We regret that owing to the fact that Brother Powell has been on the sick list for the last ten weeks we are unable to present a photograph of this interesting couple, and the golden wedding will be a quiet occasion owing to the fact of the recent death of Brother Powell's sister, and that some of his children can not be present at the reunion. Brother Powell will be pleased to receive a letter from the pastor, or some old friend in each of the churches where he has worked, advising him of their present condition.

He was born in New Lisbon, Columbiana county, Ohio, July 9, 1831; a son of Joseph and Sarah (Paul) Powell. He united with the Christian church in Wooster, Ohio, in 1849, and married Josephine C. Stauber, daughter of Dr. C. F. and Catherine Stauber, in Columbus City, Iowa, July 13, 1856, by Elder M. N. Warren. Their married life has been a busy, but happy one, and ten sons and four daughters have blessed their union. Three sons have died, and the eldest daughter, Sadie, is the wife of Bro. J. C. Hanna, of Arlington, Iowa. All save three are members of the Christian church.

Brother Powell was called to the ministry and ordained at Columbus City, Iowa, 1858. His first pastorate was at Honey Creek and Pleasant Hill. Then he served at Paris, Washington county; Lancaster and Bethel, Keokuk county, with visits to Lost Creek, and other points. In 1867 he spent some time at Hiram College, and on his return to Iowa built up the congregation at Big Springs, Jefferson county, and established new congregations in West Liberty and Nichols, Muscatine county, leaving each church with good meeting houses. He held successful meetings in Muscatine City, Springfield, and other places. After twenty-five years' service in Iowa, he moved to Barton county, Missouri, and established a church in the infidel town of Liberal, thence he moved to Sumner county, Kansas, and preached at Morris Center, his home, Corbin and South Haven. Thence he moved to Cowly county, and continued in the work, but rather spasmodically. Some thirteen years ago he moved to Cleveland county, Okla., established a congregation called Antioch, ten miles southwest of Oklahoma City, and three years ago built a good house of worship there. He now lives in Norman, helping on the cause of the Master in various ways, and preaching still for one congregation at Falls schoolhouse, one-half of his time. Brother Powell has always been a warm friend of missions and missionaries, and he has contributed every year since his first dollar was given to Dr. Barclay's Jerusalem mission in 1850. He and his beloved companion are now "Only waiting till the shadows are a little longer grown." They are associated with a fine congregation in Norman, working heartily with its pastor, R. E. McCorkle, and surrounded by pleasant and sympathetic neighbors. Many will be glad to know that these faithful workers in a good cause are so soon to realize all the hopes which must have been theirs during the past year, and we shall rejoice with them on the completion of fifty years of happy wedded life, and wish for them continued usefulness for years to come.

College Work and Plans

Atlantic Christian College.

This college is located in the town of Wilson, N. C., It is owned by the Christian Church, and has been in operation four years. Its buildings are of brick, heated by steam, lighted by electricity, with water and sewerage, with dormitory on the second floor for ladies. It has a good health record, beautiful grounds and safe environments. It has a faculty of eleven teachers, preparatory, collegiate and post-graduate courses, and seven courses leading to the A. B. degree. It gives instruction in languages, sciences, mathematics, art, leather, music, elocution and physical culture, bookkeeping, shorthand and typewriting and preparation for the ministry. The buildings stand in the midst of a beautiful grassy plot of ground, and the property has been estimated at $50,000, and is increasing rapidly in value. During the four years of operation the patronage has ranged from 100 to 200. The college is growing in favor, and its future is bright and every way full of hope.

J. J. HARPER, President.

Bethany College.

Bethany's sixty-fifth commencement festivities were the best yet. Sunday, June 10. H. P. Atkins, of Richmond, Va., preached the baccalaureate. Tuesday, June 12, came the field day exercises, the annual meeting of trustees and the president's reception. Wednesday, class day and concert, and Thursday the great day of the week, when there was oratory "to burn," and twenty-nine sheepskins were distributed. Eighty young men matriculated during the year as students in the ministerial department. Of the graduates ten have chosen the ministry for their life work. There was a large attendance of the trustees and much good work accomplished. Only one change in the faculty occurs. Prof. Beatty retires from the chair of science, and Wren J. Grinstead takes his place. The board resolved to raise a second block of $100,000 on endorsement before the centennial at Pittsburg, in 1909. The new Carnegie library is being built and will be completed by January, 1907. It will be a beautiful structure, east of Phillips Hall, and will cost $20,000. The first floor will be a hall seating 1,000 for assembly and banqueting room; the second will be the library proper with stacks for 50,000 volumes and ample reading rooms; the third will have four lecture or society rooms. The structure will be built of brokn brick with stone trimmings, and will add greatly to the group of buildings. Two hundred and sixty-four students were enrolled the past session, eighty-three of whom are ministerial and forty are already preaching. The college is self-sustaining, but has yet some debts to square up, and needs funds for equipment and necessary repairs on its buildings and for the better support of the faculty. A half million for Bethany would not more than supply its wants and make good the obligation of the brotherhood to this useful institution of learning.

The alumni meeting, with W. R. Warren as president and Prof. Philip Johnson secretary, held a good session. It was resolved to get out a full attendance of old students next commencement and hold a great banquet in the new library, to solicit books for the library from the alumni and to enlist all old Bethany's sons and daughters in raising this new block of $100,000. Mr. Carnegie's gift of $20,000 was conditioned on the raising of an equal sum on our endowment. This has been done, but $100,000 additional are needed to put Bethany well on the way to permanent prosperity. Among old students in attendance were B. T. Blanpied, George McCoard, H. P. Connelly, W. H. Fields, M. S. Decker, O. G. Hertzog, Carl Anderson, Alfred Place, V. G. Hostetter, C. C. Cowgill, Julia White, T. O. Whitaker, A. Linkletter, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Pierce, R. H. and F. E. Wynne, Ray O. Miller, D. G. Miller, O. G. White, B. C. and Mrs. Mary Campbell Hagerman, Harvey Brown, W. B. Hendershott, Miss Myrtle Sprague, Miss Muriel Scott and Miss Catherine Miller. Commencement day brought a large attendance. The Bethany Band covered itself with glory. The speeches were well received and June roses showered upon the orators of the day. It was a typical day and a typical Bethany closing. Only three honorary degrees were conferred: on W. F. Cowden the doctor of laws, and on S. W. Brown and W. B. Taylor the master of arts. Every one speaks of the excellent service of W. B. Taylor as vice president of the college and pastor of the Bethany Church. By the way, one more thing must be done before 1909—a new Alexander Campbell memorial church, an up-to-date structure of stone, should take the place of the present dilapidated Bethany house of worship. The Vermont Avenue Church asks the privilege of making the first contribution toward it. Thirty-thousand dollars will be little enough to meet this great want.

President Cramblet has now served five years. The last has been the best. Five years ago the actual enrolment the previous year was less than 100. Every year since then has shown substantial increase. The session just closed shows 264 on the roll. The income for 1900-01 was $2,416 for tuition and room rent; the income for 1905-06 is little less than $12,000, or five times as great as five years ago. This does not take into account gifts and income from endowment, but only from tuition and rents. The college work done shows the same advance. A new course in civil and mining engineering will be inaugurated the coming session. Never were the prospects brighter for Bethany. Next year will see 300 students within its walls. Prof. Keith and Col. Nave were among the missing. Their work is done. Prof. Wynne and Prof. Pendleton, or "Miss Cammie," are still doing heroic service. Buffalo Creek and the Wellsburg road, the hills and the farms, the lovely scenery and the kindly people are still there.

Berkeley Bible Seminary.

Berkeley Bible Seminary closed the year of 1905-6 in a very remarkable way. Our school year runs us really from August 20 to May 1, but when the great trembler of April 18 came we dismissed classes straightway, remitted examinations and faculty and students gave themselves to relief work. We were hurt in Berkeley in no way, and despite the loss of a few thousands in income, the seminary sustained no loss. We shall be running with full force August 21, when our next term opens.

During the last year Dean Van Kirk was compelled by press of seminary work to give up his classes in the university. Accordingly the seminary has experienced a marked development in growth. There were forty-two students enrolled. Of these fourteen are preparing for our own ministry, while the others came from the co-operating seminaries. Prof. A. M. Elston has added great strength to our teaching force. We look forward to the future with cheer and hope. Our faculty will be greatly enlarged. R. P. Shepherd, Ph.D., becomes lecturer on the English Bible, and W. P. Bentley, A. M., lecturer on missions. President McAneney continues in the field. This gives us a force of five well-known men which, with the equipment of the University of California and the co-operating seminaries, will furnish the facilities for a broad and thorough education. We have only one fear—the lack of students. We had the promise of a large entering class before the earthquake, but since then some have wavered, others have had their income cut off. There is no danger. Berkeley, as well as the greater part of California, was unhurt. There are numerous new fields opening here already. Let young men of devotion and courage come on. The Lord calls to distinguished service.

Bible College of Missouri.

This young institution is rapidly taking rank among the vigorous and aggressive in the brotherhood. A year ago it reported the erection and occupation of a most beautiful and commodious stone building. Lowry Hall has proved to be not only a home for the college and its work, but a financial success also, since it is a productive building. This year the college reports another great step in advance in its relation to the University of Missouri. Hereafter there will be an interchange of credits between the two institutions, ministerial students receiving credits for work done in the university and university students in the academic department receiving credit for work done in the more general of the Bible college courses. The Bible college management feels sure that this will greatly advance the work.

This interchange of credits is the beginning of an educational policy of which more will be heard in coming years. The inception of the plan in Columbia opens the way for other movements similar to our own, and extends the same privileges to the colleges of the Missouri College Union. For obvious reasons our growing state universities can not teach the Bible. Meanwhile young men and women continue to attend them in increasing numbers. Why should they not have the privilege of studying the Bible in affiliated institutions and receive credits for their work? The plan solves the double problem of Christianizing our universities and of building up strong Bible colleges and seminaries at reasonable cost.

Year by year the number of our ministerial and missionary students increases. Last year nineteen young men and women took studies with a view to distinctively Christian work. Between 200 and 300 other students received more or less help in Biblical ways. A number of the best known busi-

Butler College's Fifty-first Year.

At this year's commencement exercises twenty-five graduates of the class, four recipients of the A. M. degree and one guest honored with the honorary degree of LL. D., represented in a measure the finished product of Butler's educational process. Five of these are our contribution to the ministry of the Christian church: Malo M. Amunson, H. H. Harmon, H. Maxwell Hall, G. W. Henry, post-graduate students, and Cloyd Goodnight, of the class of 1906, all men of exceptional ability and of the highest standing among their fellows. One graduate, Geo. B. Baird, is under appointment of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society for work in China, and expects to sail this fall. He will take with him the prayers of a host of Butler friends, and the memory of having done much for the stimulation of interest in our foreign work among the students of the college. It is a satisfaction to know that this interest will be maintained next year by the kindness of Mrs. Atwater, of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, in leading the mission study class. The other graduates of 1906 show a good, healthy interest in the necessary and useful work of the world. A number will continue their studies at various institutions, Butler, the University of Chicago and Yale having been already decided upon by some. All of them, and the large number of friends and former students of Butler, will carry with them a long time the inspiration and help of the eloquent commencement address which E. L. Powell brought to us.

The year has been a most varied one. The attendance at all departments, preparatory, resident college work, teachers' college, art and music and the summer school, has been good, aggregating over 400. The teaching force was strengthened at the beginning of the year by the addition of Richard B. Moore, formerly of the University of Missouri, as professor of chemistry. We have been somewhat crippled, however, by the serious illness of Prof. Bruner, by the enforced absence of President Garrison, by the appointment of Prof. T. C. Howe as chairman of the endowment committee and by the work of Prof. W. D. Howe in finishing his edition of Hazlitt's works, which necessitated his going east the last half of the spring term. Instruction in all these cases, however, has been satisfactorily continued through the year by securing instructors from elsewhere and redividing the work affected.

The work of adding $250,000 to the endowment, to which President Garrison had devoted much of his energy, has gone on during the year. After President Garrison found it necessary to leave Indianapolis on account of his health, Prof. T. C. Howe was put at the head of the movement and has carried it on with increasing vigor and success for the last three months. In addition to the original conditional offer of Mr. Joseph I. Irwin of $100,000, Mr. Andrew Carnegie has offered $25,000, property worth between $25,000 and $35,000 has been given the college on the annuity plan by Mr. Charles Whitsett, of Indianapolis (counted by actuaries as equal to a cash subscription of more than $12,000, and with rising real estate values sure to be a very valuable asset in the future), and more than $25,000 has been subscribed in smaller amounts by alumni and friends of the college. Of the remaining $80,000 necessary, at least $25,000 has been promised, though not yet subscribed, so that less than $60,000 remains to be canvassed for, a task which all are hopeful of accomplishing within the next year. Other gifts, not counting on the endowment fund, reported during the year are, $500 from William Jennings Bryan, the income of which is to be loaned without interest to students needing it, and a valuable lot adjacent to the library, now held in trust for the college.

One inexpressible regret and sense of loss comes at the close of the year. President W. E. Garrison, though he would probably have continued in his work and literally have given his life for the college, was compelled, for the sake of his health, by the direction of his physicians and the urgency of his personal friends, to go temporarily to another climate. It was hoped when he left in March that he might return within a few months; but though there has been improvement, his return within a couple of years has recently been pronounced out of the question. His resignation, therefore, has been tendered and finally accepted, after two years' work, a period which though short, has told decisively for the permanent welfare of Butler. C. B. COLEMAN.

Christian University.

The year just closed has been one of strenuous work and intense application on the part of students and teachers alike. It seems to me that an earnest and faithful student does now nearly twice as much work in a given time as was done ten or twenty years ago. The course of studies in the collegiate department has again been lengthened by one year, so that we now offer four years of academic or preparatory work, followed by four full years of college work. The preparatory course has been so arranged that the graduates from it may be admitted without conditions, not only to our collegiate department, but also to the University of Missouri, Princeton College and many other universities of the highest rank.

Many have been under the impression that Christian University is a school for ministerial students only. That is a great mistake; two-thirds of our students have no thought of becoming ministers, but study such branches as are taught in all the better colleges. Last year forty of our students were preparing for the ministry, and all those who can preach acceptably found regular preaching points with neighboring congregations, earning thereby money enough to support themselves while attending school. Nearly 100 churches within seventy-five miles of Canton depend exclusively on our boys for their preaching. Indeed, we frequently have more calls for preachers than we can supply.

Christian University is now in better condition to do excellent work than ever before. Our large, new building is conceded to be the best owned anywhere by our brotherhood, the fourteen professors are all specialists in their respective branches and the 142 students in regular attendance last year are as fine and promising a body of earnest Christian men and women as can be found anywhere.

We are striving to make Christian University the rallying point and center of Christian activity in Missouri and sincerely desire the advice, help and confidence of our great brotherhood in the state. The president will gladly answer any communications in reference to our educational work.

Canton, Mo. CARL JOHANN,
President Christian University.

Christian College.

For fifty-five years Christian College has demonstrated the wisdom of its founders by the splendid results which show forth in the lives of its young women. The high standard of work done is more apparent with each passing session and the conduct of the young ladies beyond reproach. The past year there has been connected with Christian College a splendid faculty of thirty-two teachers and administrative officers, and the college has had a total enrollment of 218 students, 150 of whom were in the boarding department. Of these twelve supported themselves by domestic, clerical or monitor work, three were the recipients of full board, home and tuition scholarships four of half board, home and tuition scholarships, thirteen of full academic tuition scholarships and five of music scholarships.

Part of the year there has been one of our returned missionaries with her two children in the boarding department, and three young ladies preparing for foreign missionary work have been with us the entire year. These three will be joined by a fourth next year and all will go on with their studies, both in Christian College and the Bible college, looking to active missionary labor in some foreign field. Two of our missionaries who have been for years in a foreign land are sending their daughters back next September to be educated in Christian College.

Thirty of our young ladies have maintained a vigorous missionary society where missionary topics are studied and discussed and regular contributions made to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, they having sent this year $36 to the national fund. A voluntary contribution of $25 was also sent by the young ladies of the school for the relief of the California sufferers.

The Christian College Daughters' League has carried on weekly meetings of praise and prayer and with a membership of over 100 has done much for the religious life of the school.

The building equipment of Christian College has long been in need of new class room facilities in harmony with the growth in numbers and advancement in work. This spring Mr. Andrew Carnegie promised $25,000 for a new academic hall at Christian College, provided $25,000 additional should be raised for endowment. Steps are being taken to fulfill this condition, and it is hoped that strong friends may rally to the call so that the building will soon be under way.

The health of the college family has been most excellent; harmony and right endeavor has prevailed, and work has been done which will, we trust, not only prepare our young women for greater future usefulness, but will honor the Master and further his cause.

Cotner University.

We have closed one of Cotner's best years. Situated as it is in the midst of perhaps the greatest educational center of the new west, it has been subjected to close competition. What at first seems to be a disadvantage turns out a benefit in some ways. To succeed means great energy and enthusiasm on the part of teachers and students alike. Nebraska also has a number of excellent private institutions. These, most of them, are banded together in a college union with the State University to sustain certain uniform standards as to length of courses and entrance requirements. Cotner, spite of difficulties which all have not encountered has held honorable rank among such schools and during the past year has received valuable recognition from strong centers of education, both east and west. It is the aim to hold and strengthen a high standing.

Contact in oratorical debates and athletic tournaments has been specially interesting. A move is on foot to erect a substantial gymnasium, costing when completed about $10,000. Quite an encouraging beginning has been made in raising money. It is hoped that it may at least be enclosed for use next year. Some progress has been made in the way of endowment, a few thousands in cash have been added, several thousand in wills and unfulfilled assurances of help in the near future have given encouragement, and it is hoped that a substantial increase may be secured during the coming year. Surely no investment of consecrated means could be safer or bring greater returns than at Cotner. The Lincoln Medical College, affiliated as a department of the university from its organization, has done good work during the year. Dr. Wilmuht, one of our brethren, has recently been elected dean. A new building, very centrally located, has been purchased for lecture and hospital purposes. A prosperous year sems to be indicated by added enterprise and enthusiasm. The same prudence in business management has prevented the university from incurring debt. The prospect for the next year seems excellent, both as to attendance and other enlargements. The student body separated, charged with unbounded enthusiasm, and promise to return, bringing many others with them.

Drake University.

Drake University has just closed the twenty-fifth year of her history. In celebration of this, unusual preparation was made for commencement time. A large number of prominent men in and out of the church were present to rejoice with us during the week.

A review of the work of the University during the past year is most gratifying. The friends of the school have not failed to remember it in many and most helpful ways. The attendance has been large, and the spirit prevailing in the school has been exceedingly satisfactory. Every term has shown a small increase in the number enrolled, and in addition to that, we have had quite an increase in the total number of different students for the year. The whole number of different students registered was 1,634. Every term in the year has been larger than any previous like term in the history of the University, except the summer term.

The success of the student activities of the school was highly satisfactory. Mr. Clarence Eppard, after winning the home oratorical contest, won the State Prohibition Contest with a splendid oration. Mr. John Booth won the Home and the State Oratorical Contest, and followed these successes by winning the Inter-State Contest at Topeka, Kansas. Mr. Booth received the highest mark in thought and composition in the State Contest, and he received the highest in delivery in the Inter-State Contest. Mr. Booth will enter the ministry upon graduation, and it is certain that he will be a mighty force in that great work.

Many gifts for the University were received during the year. Gifts to the Bible Department running expense amounted to $2,018.31; to the Bible Building fund, $11,164.41; the Stadium fund, $7,665.57; the Bible endowment, $17.00; the Phoebe Lincoln scholarship, $1,000; 1903 scholarship, $575; Library endowment fund, $21,500. The total amount of gifts to the University for all purposes during the year amounted to $44,440.29. This makes the year one of the best from a financial standpoint, in the history of the University. The friends of the University were especially gratified that the institution was able to run within its income. The increase in tuitions and fees for the year amounted to over $5,000. It is the purpose during the present year to complete the Carnegie Library Endowment. $26,000 have been raised toward this endowment, but, as there are a number of annuities in this, it will be necessary to raise a larger amount in order to cover the requirements of Mr. Carnegie's gift. It is hoped that we may raise, altogether, $50,000 additional to put into this fund.

The College of Liberal Arts has had an unusually successful year, 464 different students having been enrolled in this department of the University. In the College of the Bible, 120 have been enrolled. The number of ministerial students taking work in this department was thirty per cent greater than that of any previous year. The Colleges of Law, Medicine, Music, and Normal have all been unusually successful in their work.

In planning for the work of the ensuing year, the various departments have been strengthened in many ways. The most important matter receiving attention has been the courses of study. These, in many instances, have been lengthened and in others, the requirements for entrance to the schools have been increased. This is notably true in the Law and Medical Colleges.

A few new teachers have been called. Professor M. L. Hoblit, of Agricultural College, New Mexico, has been called to take the chair of Romance languages. He will teach French and Spanish. Professor Hoblit was connected with the University some years ago, and is well known here as a man unusually well qualified for these particular lines of work. Mrs. Emma Rosen-Kerr will teach voice in the Conservatory of Music. Mrs Kerr comes to us from Cincinnati, Ohio, and is most highly recommended. Miss Ida Mae Morrison will teach piano in the College of Music. One of the most eminent scholars in the brotherhood has been chosen to fill the chair of New Testament Greek vacated by Professor Walter Stairs, but as his acceptance is not at hand, we do not feel at liberty to announce his name. Suffice it to say that, should he not accept, another wholly competent to fill this position with great credit will be chosen.

The Bible College of the University is now adequately housed in Memorial Hall, a beautiful building especially constructed for the use of this institution. It has just been completed at a cost of $30,000. It is our purpose to make the Bible College of Drake University strong in every way, and especially in the character of the work which shall be offered. Next year, an English Bible course, which is open to students who have not completed their preparatory school work; a diploma course, which is open to those who are taking work in the College of Liberal Arts; and a Bachelor of Divinity course, which is open to those who have completed a course in the College of Liberal Arts, will be offered, and the expectation is now that the patronage will be unusually large. Taken all together, the outlook for all the departments of the University is most promising.

Eugene Divinity School.

Eleven years ago President E. C. Sanderson, in an upper room in a residence, began teaching five young men who desired to prepare for the ministry of the Word. As an evangelistic missionary, he had seen the great need of the northwest for a ministry prepared in mind and heart to reach and win this wonderful, new and growing empire. During these years wise plans and management have increased every interest. Six classes have graduated. The school is located in Eugene, Lane county, Ore., 120 miles south of Portland, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, and at the head of the far-famed Willammette Valley. The school is adjacent to the State University, and our students have the same advantages on equal terms. The school has ample grounds and good buildings, free from debt and a growing endowment fund. Our watchword is $50,000 endowment by October, 1909. We have a most excellent Biblical library of 2,500 volumes. The students also have access to the university and city libraries.

The school has become the greatest misionary and evangelistic force in the northwest. To secure qualified preachers is the great problem in this vast field with multiplying churches. The school is solving this problem by sending out pastors, evangelists and many Sunday-school and church workers. The faculty is strong in pastoral, evangelistic and teaching experience. The confidence of the brethren is increasing the support. President Sanderson, by wise financial management, has closed each year of the eleven free from debt on current expenses. Many parents, seeing the good work, are giving their sons to the ministry. A strong church joins the teachers and students in extending a cordial welcome to all.

Eureka College.

One of the most pleasant sessions in the history of Eureka College has just closed. The character of the college is such that it attracts a superior class of young people from our best homes. Young people who wish their college days to count for as much as possible, yet under pleasant and happy conditions, come. They come to us from Canada, England, Japan, Australia, District of Columbia, Wisconsin and several other states besides our own. The character of work was of high order, as well as the deportment of the student body. The young ladies, who constitute about one-third of the number, conduct a very profitable Y. W. C. A., as also do the young gentlemen a Y. M. C. A. Our heating plant has proved very satisfactory, the senior class laid a fine granitoid walk from Burgess Hall to the chapel as a kind of farewell appreciation to alma mater, and other improvements are being made.

The faculty remains materially the same as last year. The Bible department has enlarged its course of study. Prof. Radford will devote most of his time to it, as will also Prof. Jones, and President Hieronymous will teach at least one class in the English Bible. College opened with an able lecture; Founders' day was duly observed, having several able addresses. The joint committee of the literary societies arranged a fine lecture course for the year. Marion Stevenson, state Sunday-school evangelist of Illinois, spent a month in Eureka, giving (1) a course of lectures on the Pentateuch, (2) on Sunday-school teaching and (3) a course to preachers on various Sunday-school problems. W. M. Forrest, late of Calcutta, India, gave two courses of lectures, one on the prophets, the other on the India people, life and habits. President J. W. McGarvey gave a course of popular Biblical lectures at the church and conducted a series of conferences at the college for a week. All these and other incidental lectures are most helpful, useful and enjoyable. Arrangements are already being made for such work for next year. The college, through two generous friends, has been able to install an elegant printing plant, which will be useful in publishing leaflets, bulletins, etc., as well as aiding young men in getting their education.

The college conducted twenty-four educational conferences during the fall at as many places, which were well attended and helpful. Education day was observed by sixty-eight churches in the state, with an aggregate offering of $1,370.45. This shows a manifest growth in spirit and sentiment in favor of education. Already a number of preachers have promised to observe the day in 1907. The financial condition of the college has steadily improved. The completion of the second Coleman proposition gave the college $3,000, besides the regular dues from about 2,000 members of the Educational Association. We want this association to have a membership of 5,000 as soon as possible, each paying $1 or more a year. Uncle William Britt gave us $2,000 endowment.

President R. E. Hieronymus accepted an unusually favorable opportunity to take a trip to Europe this summer, but will return before time for college to open in September. He made ample provision for his work and correspondence to be taken care of while he is away. He needs the rest and the trip will be of great educational value to him and to the college. J. G. W.

Hamilton College.

The thirty-seventh annual session showed a total enrollment of 260 students from nineteen states and one foreign country. The demand for accommodations was so great that several teachers were placed in near-by rooms so that students need not be refused, and the 40 per cent increase during the past three years shows a steady and healthy growth. The teaching and administrative staff have numbered thirty-two, twenty-four of these being teachers. The following important changes on the faculty have been made for next year: Signor G. Aldo Randegger is the new dean of the school of music. Signor Randegger is a first-honor graduate at the Royal Conservatory, Italy, and has had a number of years of valuable teaching experience in this country, having taught in Atlanta, Ga., and New York City. He is a composer of merit and a brilliant pianist, and comes to the work at Hamilton with the highest endorsements. The school of music will have as the new director of the vocal department Mrs. Louise Cowan Bigelow, pupil of Mme. Ashforth, New York; Norman McCloud and Henrietta Hascall, of Boston. Mrs. Bigelow is an experienced teacher and possesses a beautiful lyric soprano voice. The academic department will have two new instructors: Miss Jessie L. P. Brown, teacher of sacred and civil history, has an A. B. from Barnard College and an A. M. from Columbia University and a teacher's certificate from Teachers' College, New York. Miss Kate Galt Miller is the new head of the Latin department and is an A. B. of Vassar College, with a year of graduate study at Vassar.

The excellent scholastic standing of Hamilton has been thoroughly tested by higher institutions and our pupils have made, in every instance, excellent records. The health record has been phenomenal. Not a case of serious illness has occurred during the past year.

With the investment of $25,000 within the past three years the buildings have been enlarged and improved until they are in perfect condition. During the past year a magnificent portico of gray stone has replaced the old wooden structure, and this latest improvement gives great dignity to the main building. The portico, 40x17 feet, supported by massive Corinthian columns, cost $3,000 and is almost entirely the gift of the alumni. The morale of the student body has been of the highest order. We largely attribute this condition to the strong religious life of the school, numbering among its influences a large auxiliary to the C. W. B. M., a strong organization of the Y. W. C. A. and a mission study circle. These organizations have held weekly meetings, and some of the financial contributions for good causes have been as follows: Twenty-five dollars to the dormitory at Morehead, $35 to the Kentucky University Volunteer Association, $30 to the state budget of the Y. W. C. A., $20 to the national C. W. B. M. Besides this faithful work has been done in some local settlement interests.

The purchase of the residence property to the north of the Hamilton grounds (formerly the home of President Robert Graham) is the first step toward much-needed improvement. This valuable and beautiful corner lot should be made the site of a new building containing an entertainment hall, a gymnasium and additional class rooms. Somewhere the money is waiting to be used for this splendid purpose; somehow it must be enlisted for this purpose.

Hiram College.

June 22 was a beautiful day on Hiram Hill. A very large company, especially of old students, was present and the old "tabernacle" was never better filled. Six seniors gave orations which would do honor to any college class, and President Rowlinson gave diplomas certifying the bachelor's degree to twenty-four young men and women. It was a great disappointment that at the last moment President Burris A. Jenkins, who was to have been the commencement speaker, should have been kept away, but the large number of alumni present made afternoon meetings of unusual interest. On Wednesday five young men—Garry L. Cook, J. F. Baxter, S. L. Lyon, O. L. Hull and A. C. Young—were ordained to the ministry. They are most excellent young men. The ordination sermon, an unusually strong discourse, was preached by President E. V. Zollars. Indeed, the presence of President Zollars, as he moved genially and with warm welcomes amid scenes where he had achieved so much, was one of the brightest passages of the week. Hiram College owes him much and will follow him everywhere with grateful good will.

The meeting of the board of trustees was full and earnest and optimistic. It was the one expressed thought that Hiram should go steadily on in the line of her present work, and it was felt that means could be secured which would insure larger growth. The faculty will remain essentially as during the past year, except that Prof. H. H. Lane, who has had charge of the work in biology, goes to fill a chair in Oklahoma University. He is a good man every way, and "a comer," and it is a privilege to say that much. C. T. Paul, returning from China, will take charge of the modern language department. Students are apt to love their college home, but it is not amiss to say that few are loved as Hiram is. There is reason for it. And that heart loyalty is the best possession a college ever has. May it never fail to Hiram!

How a Church may be a Seminary.

The Christian Temple Seminary at Baltimore, Md., offers a systematic and popular course of Bible study, covering three years, and divided as follows: The Freshman year is devoted to the Old Testament and there are four examinations, one after each period, the law, history, poetry and prophecy. The junior year is devoted to the New Testament and likewise has four examinations, biographical (the four Gospels), historical (the Acts), epistolary and apocalyptic. The senior year has its four periods, chart study of both Old and New Testament, ecclesiastical history, Christian evidence and Christian missions, with some supplementary work in the art galleries of Baltimore and Washington, making in all twelve written examinations for the entire course.

There is only one lecture a week given to each class. The Bible is the text-book. To know it only as a means to know him is the purpose of this study, which is conducted from the historical and devotional viewpoints, and persons of various denominational affiliations have been among the matriculates. On the completion of this three years' course diplomas are conferred on the graduates at the regular commencement exercises, and only those holding diplomas may become members of the guild of the Round Table, which is a four years' reading course. The first year is the re-reading of the Old Testament with helps from several other books; the second year is the New Testament, likewise with the reading of four or five other books; the third year is the reading of the missionary books of both Testaments, with four or five books on modern missions, and the fourth year is a study of Jesus Christ in history, poetry, art and personal living. On simply stating that one has read these books a second seal is added to his diploma.

This course of study is designed for busy people, and it is popular. A correspondence course is being arranged for and perhaps may be ready by September. Next to the saving of men the greatest business in the world is teaching the Bible. Last year there were forty matriculates and at the opening of the next season, in September, the indications already are that it will be greatly increased. Peter Ainslie, Dean.

Iowa Christian College.

Oskaloosa College was incorporated in 1856, and has graduated a large number, many of whom are filling important positions in life. As a new work opened up here, with a new management, new articles of incorporation were secured in July, 1902, under a new name, and the institution is now composed of the foollowing departments: College of the Bible, Oskaloosa normal college, Oskaloosa business college, correspondence Bible college. Our work the past year has been in fine shape. Our third year closed at the commencement in June, with 130 enrollment in all departments of the resident work. We had fifteen graduates, five ministers, one teacher, four from the music department and the remainder from the business college.

While our normal and business work is growing rapidly the ministerial is by no means in the background. We have a splendid ministerial course and fine opportunities here for those who wish to study for the ministry. Our motto is, "More work, better work, larger work." Consequently we are laying the foundation well for future building. Our building is in very good shape. It contains three stories and twenty rooms, all of which have been papered and painted the past two or three years. We have a beautiful campus at the west end of the new electric car line. It is our aim to give those who come here a good, thorough, practical education and to send them away prepared for their work and with better conceptions of duty and responsibility.

As to the correspondence school, that has been in fine shape all along. We have at present more than 1,000 enrollment in this department, representing every state of the Union and the following foreign countries: Canada, England, Scotland, Holland, Japan, India, Australia, Ceylon, Africa, Bermuda, Jamaica, Porto Rico and Hawaii. The practicability of this work is seen in the fact that it covers not only the Bible and sacred literature, but the languages, mathematics, sciences, history, literature, philosophy and commercial branches.

Chas. J. Burton, President.

Kentucky University.

Kentucky University has closed its most successful session since the seventies. At the mention of the board, June 13, it elected four young up-to-date men as curators, namely, W. E. Ellis, Hugh McLellan, J. A. Stucky and Charles R. Hudson. In the past five years the university has added to its assets something like $80,000, not counting the annexation of Hamilton College, which represents $65,000 or $70,000, nor the erection of the Carnegie public library on the lower end of the college lawn, a $60,000 building with an annual maintenance fund from the city of $6,000. It has just completed, also, the raising of the money required for the erection of a science building, donated by Mr. Carnegie, to cost $25,000. This gift was conditioned on raising $25,000 to add to the endowment. The condition has been fulfilled and the building will be erected as soon as plans can be arranged for.

The attendance in the university for the past year has been upward of 1,100 in all departments. The increase in mature and well-prepared students has been especially noticeable in the College of Liberal Arts and the College of the Bible. This is due, doubtless to the elevated standards of the university and to the increase in efficiency in the secondary schools of Kentucky. The attendance has embraced thirty-four states and territories and seven foreign countries. There were nineteen students from Australia—the largest Australian club that the university has yet possessed and these students are of very high type.

President Jenkins is to be in Lexington throughout the summer, directing the campaign for the coming session, and a large crop of canvassers has been sent out to all parts of the state and into some adjoining southern states. Large results are anticipated from this vigorous summer campaign.

The work of Secretary Walter White, which began January 1, has fulfilled the expectations of the authorities of the university in the highest degree. Brother White has made favorable impression wherever he has gone, and his work will doubtless be felt in the coming year in increased attendance and endowments.

The additions to the faculty during the past five years have proved satisfactory. There are now in the university five doctors of philosophy of large eastern institutions, vigorous, up-to-date young professors, who are ably supplementing the work done by the old-established professors whose reputation is already so well known in the brotherhood. The friends of the institution are confident of its future and especially hopeful for the approaching session.

The morale of the student body is higher than it has ever been. The students are a fine set of men, and there is little or no trouble in maintaining order among them. Their loyalty to the institution is marked, and every one of them goes out as an agent to bring others back. The attendance in the university next year will undoubtedly be the largest in the history of the institution of recent years. Burris A. Jenkins.

Louisville Christian Bible School.

This school was in its inception a creature of what is now the American Christian Missionary Society. Later it came under the care of the C. W. B. M. Its purpose was and is to assist young men of the colored race to be acceptable and efficient public servants of the church as Sunday-school teachers, Christian Endeavor workers, prayer-meeting leaders, elders, deacons and preachers. Friends who have visited the school in its daily work or witnessed its annual closing exercises have almost invariably expressed themselves as most agreeably surprised at the evidences of improvement and advancement which they have noted. C. C. Smith was present at the last closing exercises and publicly stated that the addresses of some of the students were as good as would be heard at college commencements of white people; but that he would not be believed if he should make that statement elsewhere. Mrs. Hagerman, vice president of Kentucky's C. W. B. M., spoke up, saying she would be believed in making it.

The claim is made by some of the older colored preachers who have known most of the work and results of the school that the Louisville Christian Bible school is the best gift of the white Christian Church to the colored people of the nation. Be this as it may, it is gratifying to those who are interested in the intellectual, moral and spiritual development of the negro to know that the Bible school has had and does have some part, however humble, in this great work. It is also gratifying to know that some of the colored people, those best acquainted with it, appreciate the help it affords them and are grateful for it. Up to the present time twelve of our home states and Jamaica and Australia besides have been represented in our classes.

The year just closed has been one of the most prosperous. There have been difficulties and discouragements confronting teachers and students, but the struggle against poverty, in which every student is involved, and the limitations imposed by it have, with the encouragement of teachers, tended to develop in the students that determination, industry, patience, perseverance and endurance which enter so largely into the composition of useful and heroic lives. A goodly portion of the enrollment of the year are students of more than average promise. Three colored churches out of four in the city were supplied with their regular preaching. A number of other pulpits, some of them regularly and others occasionally, were also filled by the students. Besides this they did Sunday-school, prayer-meeting, mission and open-air Sunday service in different parts of the city.

The prospects are hopeful for an increased attendance next year. Will not a number of friends call the attention of promising young negroes to the school? Speak a word of encouragement; ask them to send for a catalogue and investigate the opportunities open to them. A. J. Thompson.

Milligan College.

The past session of Milligan College was highly successful. The enrollment was larger than that of the previous year, the class of students was the best on the average we have had for years, the students were older, the class work was fine and the behavior of the student body was never better. All of our teachers are Christians, and none of them uses tobacco. They uphold a high standard of morality.

There are fine prospects of the next session. A large part of the old students will return to school, and a goodly number of new ones are expected. We are planning to enlarge the plant and the work in every way. We are now making brick for a new college building which we expect to erect next vacation. More than $11,000 has already been donated in cash and pledges for the purpose of erecting this building. The people are responding liberally to the calls of our financial agent, and everything is hopeful for the college. The old buildings are to be repaired and remodeled. New equipments, new heating apparatus, water and electric lights are to be put in as soon as the means are provided. We hope to make this small college here in this mountainous country where its good work is so much needed one of the best schools in every way in all this section.

R. H. Garrett, President.
Milligan, Tenn.

The College of the Bible.

The session of this institution which closed in June was the most prosperous in its history. The attendance ran up to 216, and the average attainments of the students in scholarship were higher than usual. Prof. Grubbs, on account of feeble health, had leave of absence, but the work of his professorship was successfully continued by his colleagues, who cheerfully bore the added burden for his sake. He is now in such a condition that, though still feeble, he proposes to resume his labors with the opening of the coming session. Like the lamented President Milligan during the last few years of his career, Prof. Grubbs has bravely borne the burden of his responsible work for several years, under the disadvantage of physical weakness, while the vigor of his mental powers has remained unimpaired.

The very efficient financial agent of the college, W. T. Donaldson, has continued his work of solicitation and has added a material sum to the college endowment; and although a large per cent of the subscriptions is not yet payable, the resources of the college are such as to justify the addition to the faculty of another professor in the person of W. C. Marrs, who has recently received from Harvard University the degree of Ph.D. He was an honor graduate of Kentucky University in both the College of the Bible and the College of Liberal Arts, in 1898, and it is in realization of a constant hope since that date that he is welcomed as a fellow laborer. We now have six professors. With this addition to the teaching force of the college, it is now prepared for an enlargement of its Biblical courses, while maintaining without diminution the thoroughness which has characterized it. It is confidently expected that, notwithstanding the multiplication of institutions which offer comparatively meager courses of Biblical study, its number of students will continue to steadily increase, and especially that the number of graduates from other colleges who seek its superior advantages will be multiplied.

Very many of the students now in attendance are preachers of some years' experience. Sixty-five of these filled regular preaching appointments last year and visited 113 churches. Quite a number of others could have done the same, but the number of churches within reach from Lexington that are without the labor of settled preachers is limited. The nineteen men who graduated last month are all preachers of such experience as fits them for important positions, and to such they are already called.

The increasing number of young women who desire a good knowledge of the Bible in order to efficiency as Sunday-school teachers, and especially as missionaries to the heathen, has led to the opening of the College of the Bible to women on the same conditions as to men, and during the last session there were eight matriculates of this class, one of whom graduated.

The number of men studying for the ministry would be greatly increased if preachers and others would take pains to call the attention of all worthy young brethren to the opportunities for such study that are within their reach. We shall be grateful to any friend who will send us the

The Southern Christian Institute.

All through the south where there are white churches many negro churches have sprung up through the helpful influence of some of the best members of these churches. The provision our people have made for training ministers and teachers for these churches and communities was entirely inadequate to the demands, our entire expenditure since we began not amounting to more than what our religious neighbors expend annually. The negro churches have had to depend on men who have had no training for their work. As a result our churches have been disorganized, like sheep without a shepherd. But now there is a change. The churches are asking for ministers and teachers. There are fifty places to be filled where one can be filled. They are ready to co-operate if we can put a shepherd among them to show them what co-operation means. The negroes who have come from the various missionary schools are now leading their people and they are fast changing the ideal of the race. Fifteen or twenty years ago their ambition was to get something. Now the ambition is to do something and to show that they can. They humbly appreciate what we have done for them, and are asking us to help them to make themselves a useful factor in our society. What we do in the next twenty-five years will determine the condition of the Negro Church of Christ for 200 years to come, if not throughout the entire life of this American republic.

Let no one be discouraged because this question is an old one and has been harped on much. It is true the negro problem has been ever present from the foundation of the nation; but we are now in that stage of the battle when flank movements and assaults in force will decide the fate of the day and the issue of the war. Let the reader stand with us on this beautiful hill and look out and see a stretch of country from Southern California to South Carolina beckoning for help, asking that preachers be sent to their churches and that prepared men and women be sent to school in their midst, and he will be in a frame of mind to understand more clearly what we mean when we tell of our work and what our purposes are.

Our attendance last year was 15 per cent better than any previous session. The morale also has been better. We have maintained strict discipline and those whose tendency was toward criminality were soon weeded out. We did all that could be done with the means at hand to perfect both our school work and our industries. As a result, much progress was manifested. Prof. T. M. Burgess has been enabled to devote his whole time to bringing out class room work, and the good results are very evident. Willis Prout, superintendent of industries, has brought out most excellent results in the one department of farming.

Our aim for the future must be twofold, yet with one result in view. We must go on and perfect the work at the school we have already undertaken, and we must organize the Negro Disciples for more effective work. The "Gospel Plea" must be made the medium through which much of this work will be done. The time is now ripe to do this provided we can be enabled to equip ourselves better so we can make it a better paper. The dawn of a new day has come. Our prayer is that when high noon comes we may be found ready to garner in the great harvest.

The School of the Evangelists.

We are slowly but surely recovering from the awful fire which, on December 1, 1904, swept away our splendid main building. On January 11, 1906, we were far enough along to reopen school, although we were by no means complete. We enrolled students from 25 states and countries —110 in all. We are now at work on the buildings. It is our purpose to have, by God's help, everything in readiness for the opening, September 19, 1906. We have built a power house, containing engine and boiler rooms, coal room, laundry, bakery, lavatory and shower bath, all equipped with up-to-date necessities. We have built a large combined college building (three stories) and dormitory (four stories). These buildings are furnished with up-to-date furnishings, steam and electricity, steam cooking, etc. Some idea of the magnitude of the work may be seen in the fact that the buildings measure nearly 700,000 bricks.

In answer to prayer God has given us in labor, material and cash close to $30,000. We need about $3,000 more. We are getting it slowly but surely. We appeal to our friends to remember us in this last long, hard pull. We have planned a perfect equipment and accommodations for 160 young preachers. A young man can get help here. For example, if he can pay his tuition ($24) a year he can work out his room rent, board and plain washing by working a certain number of hours a week; or he can pay $85 and not work. We want to help the young men, and we are in a position to do it. We want clean young men—young men who do not use tobacco in any form. We want young men who have their minds made up to preach and to do nothing else, and we want them at the opening of next term. We want the address of every young man in the English-speaking world who desires to preach, whether he has money or not. The fact is, poverty, principle and purpose constitute the highest recommendation here.

The Lord and his people have graciously given us the equipment and the open door. Will not our brethren everywhere call the attention of the young men to the opportunity? Our new catalogue is free for the asking. It tells the whole story. Ashley S. Johnson, President.

The University of Virginia Bible Chair.

During the past session the Bible work at the University of Virginia has included one course of lectures by Dr. H. L. Willett, and two courses by me as regular lectures there. A variety of causes prevented my being present for systematic work throughout the year. Chief among them was the conviction that it was not worth while to maintain continuous work where the absence of academic credit made impossible regular study on the part of the students.

For the three years that I have had charge of the work I have endeavored to secure for it a place in the curriculum. It has been evident all along that in no other way could systematic Bible teaching of university grade be made possible. It is a satisfaction to all friends of the work that the university board has just put Bible teaching upon the same footing with other branches of learning by creating the John B. Cary chair of Biblical history and literature. They have provided that candidates for the B. A. degree may elect one course in this department. The work is to be supported as heretofore by the C. W. B. M. Thus a new opportunity for Bible teaching, under circumstances worthy of its dignity and importance, has been afforded in this old and honorable state university.

Too much praise can not be given our brother, Dr. Charles W. Kent, professor of English literature, for his efforts to attain this end. From the very beginning of the Bible lectureship he has been its steadfast friend. Without his unfailing efforts it would not have been possible to secure this recognition. The friends of the Bible everywhere are his debtors. Much is also due to the efforts of President Alderman. Ever since he assumed the high office that he is so ably and successfully filling, he has interested himself in the Bible work. To his advocacy of the plan in the meetings of the board its adoption must be credited.

Necessarily this important step is in the nature of an experiment. If it succeeds it will become a permanent part of the university teaching. It has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of those who are acquainted with the facts that Bible teaching can not be sucessfully conducted at the University of Virginia without such recognition and credit as have now been granted. Under the present plan there is good reason to hope for an ever enlarging success. It seems fitting that the university which has led in so many important educational movements should also be a pioneer here. This advance step on the part of one of our oldest universities in the east, along with a somewhat similar move by one of the youngest institutions of the far west, should open the way for a like move elsewhere. Friends of the Bible should see to it that it secures the same opportunity in other state institutions that it has at the University of California and the University of Virginia [and Missouri also.—Editor.] W. M. Forrest.

William Woods College.

With profound gratitude the managers of this institution recognize the achievements of the past and the improvements contemplated for the summer and fall are thrilling the donors and the patrons everywhere with supreme delight. The auditorium, which will be known as the "D. M. Dulany Auditorium," will rank among the best in the state and will have a capacity for seating at least 1,000 people, with two galleries, and its equipment throughout will be complete. The basement will for the present be used as a gymnasium. A grand piano and organ will in all probability be introduced this winter. This institution will be articulated with the university. Its curriculum meets every just demand. Preparations are being made to accommodate a larger enrollment than that of last year. New school rooms will be added and new apparatus will be introduced in the scientific department. The teaching force will be increased.

The most gratifying feature in the outlook for the institution is the continued friendship and generosity of Dr. W. S. Woods and wife. All told, from first to last, their gifts will amount to nearly $100,000. Other generous persons, like the Dulanys, Edwards and Adams, are co-operating with these good people. The brotherhood throughout the state should recognize the fact that this institution makes education possible to nearly every aspiring girl. Their generosity should kindle the deepest sympathy in the hearts of other benevolent persons who can duplicate what they have done by giving scholarships for the education of the daughters of foreign missionaries and for extending privileges to a larger number of dependent girls. It is expected that the patronage heretofore extended by those blessed with ample means will continue, since the co-education of the two classes has achieved the very best results. It is hoped that some day an endowment of $500,000 will be realized. An ample endowment, however, will in no wise cancel the obligations of preachers and churches to co-operate in this great work. The oft quoted expression of Alexander Campbell finds its fulfillment in the triumphs of this institution: "Attempt great things, expect great things and great things will follow." J. B. Jones.

Texas Christian University.

The sky of Christian education in the southwest is bright and hopeful. The past few years have been years of growth. Now some advance steps that have been hoped for for years will be undertaken, and the spirit of the work is permanency. We have had a period of building. Under the aggressive leadership of President Zollars improvements in buildings and equipments have gone on at a marvellous rate. During the past year no buildings have been added, but there has been much activity in raising funds for interior equipment, library, apparatus, etc. A few of our churches observed Educational day and quite a number of others made liberal pledges on the visits of President Zollars. There is much regret at losing this strong man from the work in Texas. His administration has contributed an invaluable element to T. C. U. at a period that was critical in her history. This year's work has sent out one of the strongest classes in the history of Texas Christian University, and leaves a student body coming on.

Toward the future our workers are looking with a large spirit of hopefulness and confidence, especially because of the definite lines of enlargement that are undertaken at this time. Some of these are the plans that have been in our prayers for years. The Bible college is greatly enlarged. The scarcity of funds has always limited this department below the requirements of the field. The demand for preachers in Texas and the imperative duty of training our own Texas boys for the ministry has caused the trustees to concentrate our improvements this year on the Bible college. There will be three men to give full time to it, besides some teaching that will be done by professors in other departments. With such men as Dr. Clinton Lockhart, Prof. Stairs and Ellsworth Faris to train the preacher boys, great and permanent work is looked for. This makes the department entirely new, as Prof. F. H. Marshall has gone to train the native workers in Norway, under the foreign society. Another help for the preacher boys is the establishment of a club boarding house for them. This will be ready by the opening in September and will help reduce the cost of living materially.

Another attestation of the strictly up-to-date character of the Texas educational work is the move of putting into the field this year an educational secretary. Only pioneer work along this line has been done by our people as yet, but the time is at hand for some fundamental effort to reach our people for education. The secretary was selected some time before the Indianapolis congress, thus anticipating the action of the educational society there in throwing the responsibility back upon the individual colleges.

The writer of this article was selected jointly by the T. C. U. trustees and the State Mission Board to represent the brotherhood of Texas and the southwest as educational secretary. He enters upon the work July 1. The direct effort at first will be to enlist the churches in the observance of Educational day, and to find and enlist a new crop of preachers. There may be a superabundance of preachers in some states, but there is not in Texas. This is because of the fact that so many of our churches that have been weak are getting able to support ministers. This great problem, vital and pressing, we feel will be solved by the present course and equipment. In additon to this, the secretary will have to enlist in the interest of our education large numbers of our people whose influence now is lost because of lack of touch with the work. In addition to this work Bro. T. E. Shirley, who has done such a magnificent work as financial agent, will be assisted by John L. Andrews. Brother Shirley has had to go to Hereford on account of the condition of his health. Announcement will be made before long of some large plans for securing much needed endowment in the next few years.

Dr. Clinton Lockhart has been in Texas only a few weeks, but he has made friends rapidly and his coming has inspired great confidence in the work. He was sought earnestly and secured as dean of the Bible college. This is where he is needed and where his chief work will be done. He has also been made acting president for the coming year. With such leaders and a strong, experienced faculty; with our two other schools incorporated with us, viz.: Carleton College and Panhandle Christian College; with other schools of our brethren closely allied, and with such fundamental problems as our task, we feel that great things are in store for this cause in the great southwest. We believe a period of solid and permanent growth is just ahead of us.

Hillsboro, Tex. Colby D. Hall.

Washington Christian College.

The fourth year of educational work was the best session in every way the college has had. The college has won a large number of friends and patrons and the executive members of the board of trustees have manifested great faithfulness to the institution. The college is doing a much needed work, in that the majority of the students we get would certainly never be in a Christian college.

For the coming session there will be only two changes worth mention. The young ladies' home will be partly refurnished. There will be even more Bible and kindred studies than last session. A special additional fund is being raised for this work. The college, realizing there never was an age when able preachers were more needed, wishes thorough and strong courses for those preparing for the ministry. The emphasis of the institution is always put upon the quality of the work done. The faculty has proven so satisfactory and there will be no changes of importance. To it is added an associate professor of Latin and mathematics.

Miss Minna Schott is a very valuable addition to the music department.

Emerson W. Matthews, professor of Latin and Greek, who is one of the best language teachers in the country, is spending the summer in Germany doing special work in his favorite studies at Heidelberg University. He is a graduate of Harvard University

The prospects for the coming session are good. More than half of the young ladies' home is already contracted for.

Remarkable Invention

AN INSTRUMENT THAT IMPROVES AND RESTORES EYESIGHT

Spectacles Can Be Abandoned

This instrument, which the inventors have patented, is called "Actina"—a trade-mark word.

In the treatment of eye diseases the inventors of "Actina" claim there is no need for cutting or drugging the eye, for most forms of disease. Cataracts, pterygiums and other abnormal growths can be removed and weakened vision improved or restored by the new and more humane method. If this is a fact there will be no need to go blind or to wear spectacles. "Actina" has been tested in hundreds of cases and has effected marvelous cures. So confident are the inventors that this device is an article of great merit that they give absolutely a free trial. They want everyone interested to make a thorough investigation and a personal test of "Actina." One will be sent on trial postpaid. Any person can give it a test.

They issue a book of 100 pages—a complete dictionary of disease—which tells all about "Actina," the diseases it will cure, what others think of it, what marvelous cures it has effected, and all about the responsibility of its owners—all is sent absolutely free upon request. This book should be in the library of every family. Address New York and London Electric Association, Dept. 203 R., 929 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting

TRANSIENT GOODNESS.—Hosea 6:4.

"My soul, it is the Lord
  Who calls thee by his grace;
Now loose thee from each cumbering load,
  And bend thee to the race.

"Thy crown of life hold fast,
  Thy heart with courage stay;
Nor let one trembling glance be cast
  Along the backward way."

One truly good hour in a penitent's to-day is a bright prophecy of a good, full month next year, and an eternity of goodness (or heaven) beyond the flood.

Transient goodness is evidence of power to be good, as it also is of lack of proper determination and stability of character. We are not drawn from the clear atmosphere of goodness out into the murkiness of evil—we go, and the responsibility rests on us. Let us strive to enlarge the area of the good stages in our pilgrimage till they become at last as a sky, cloudless from horizon to horizon.

A life shotted through with periods of transient goodness is vastly preferable to one that is a rayless story of wrong. There is reason to believe the doom of a wasted life will be mitigated by the record of every good thought and chivalrous deed the keen light of judgment day will reveal amidst the debris of the past. Let us encourage even those whom we have no hope of leading into the church to fulfill the promptings of every good impulse. If it does not add a new joy to their heaven, it will at least quench one fury in their hell.

It was good in Ananias and Sapphira to so enter into the spirit of giving as to promise the church the price of the field, but avarice retained half and they lost all and were borne to disgraceful graves. Achan, we take it, was a good man, but cupidity was his undoing. Saul was far happier living in obscurity but in divine favor than afterward in royal splendor but alienated from God. Though poor, unknown to fame, and not one of the great lights of the church, "Be thou faithful unto death, and thou shalt receive the crown of life."

Satan never sees us in our better estate, but it can be said of him, "He hath desired us that he might sift us as wheat." But he can not reach within the cordon of angels divine love hath placed about us to guard us and draw us out for destruction. The band will open to let us out but not to let him in. As an angel of light he now stands in the midst of illusions inviting us to bask with him in a wealth of false promises. Let us not be deceived by cunningly devised fables concerning the wages of sin, but rather give heed unto the words of the Savior: "Behold, I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast that no man take thy crown."

Many will say, "I have been good, and the promised joys of goodness have not come to me." Yes, they have been good for a week out of a lifetime of waywardness. Why, after the winds have ceased, the surface of the waters are long disturbed as an effect of the storm; likewise the demoralizing effects of sin are very manifest in our lives long after actual commission has ceased, and we have little reason to expect the sweets of virtue till all are eliminated. We must enter into the meaning of patient continuance in well doing. One more blow with the pick after one miner has yielded to discouragement has revealed storied wealth; one more round with the spade has opened fountains that have made deserts bloom. Continue in goodness, for in due time we, too, shall "reap if we faint not."

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.—Luke 10:25-37.

Memory verses, 33, 34.

Golden Text.—Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.—Matt. 5:7.

Chapters 10 to 17, inclusive, in the Gospel of Luke, contain matter which is not paralleled by any of the other evangelists. It is represented that after Jesus had completed his ministry in Galilee and had turned his face toward Jerusalem to meet his death, he made first a direct journey to the vicinity of Jerusalem (perhaps to the city itself for the feast of dedication.—John 9 and 10): then a long and circuitous journey through Perea, the country east of the Jordan, and a return again to the neighborhood of Jerusalem; then a northern tour into Ephraim and a final return by way of Jericho to Jerusalem. The whole of this period is called the Perean ministry, and each of its three parts closed with a visit to Bethany. The first time he visited Mary and Martha; the second time he raised their brother Lazarus from the dead; the third time he was anointed by Mary.

It was after the final departure from Galilee, and after the sending out of seventy disciples to preach and heal, that Jesus spoke this parable of mercy. The good Samaritan has become, to all subsequent generations, the type of the merciful and unselfishly helpful man.

A lawyer came to Jesus to put him to a test. He asked a great question, how to secure eternal life, perhaps seeking to entangle the Master in some subtle argument about the law. But Jesus shunned subtleties, then as always. He was always profound, but never idly subtle. He led his inquirer at once to solid ground. Eternal life comes through love to God and one's neighbor. This was the highest word of the law, and, as a general principle, it was high enough. But it wanted application. It needed to be made concrete, definite and personal.

So Jesus spoke a parable to show how the obligation of man to man overleaps all bounds of creed and caste and is of universal validity. Even the despised Samaritan, by observing it, won the approval of God and compels the approbation of man. Our debt to our neighbors as fellow-townsmen, as fellow-Christians, as fellow-countrymen, as members of the same family, or club, or business organization, is something. But underlying all that is our debt to man as man. It is a man's manhood that is in the image of God—not his Americanism, or his membership in a political party or in a religious community, or in a social group. And it is to God's image in man that our respect and service are due.

At the time when this parable was spoken, and among the people to whom it was spoken, the term "Samaritan" was a name of reproach. Jesus' use of it in this connection has made it carry an honorable meaning. If the mere use of the name in a story for purposes of illustration can lend it such an odor of sanctity, how much more does the practice of charity, the custom of friendly and unselfish service to all men make an honorable character and an honored name.

"The only solid basis of true and lasting friendship is to be found in the mutual possession of right principles, virtuous character and a true life."

The immortalization of friendship in the sacred biographies of Ruth and Naomi, Esther and Mordecai, David and Jonathan, Paul and Timothy, Jesus and Lazarus, Martha and Mary are expressions of heaven's appreciation of the importance of this grace in effecting the brotherhood of man and right relations between man and the great "Friend" of all.

If it is evidence of friendship to help one into possession of a field, it is proof of a more exalted quality to help him to a heavenly inheritance. If it is an expression of friendship to cultivate in him a taste for music and art, how much nobler to help him up into an appreciation of God and his righteousness? In the commerce of friendship let us earnestly seek to secure and bestow "the best gifts."

You may make beneficiaries of many out of whom you can not make friends. There must be congeniality and much in common between men before they can be friends. Only fine metal can receive certain impressions, and only the higher natures can receive the seal of friendship. It is a high testimonial to one's worth to be the friend of a great and good man. To be a true friend is proof of a noble character. This is a touch stone helping us to know ourselves as we are.

"Never desert a friend under fire," was an admonition to the cadets by Gen. Grant that the world approves. Centuries before, he of whom the prophet philosopher had said, "There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother," calmly remarked, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." If free from moral turpitude, he will commend us though all men should speak evil of us or forget us; and if we go down to our graves with our faces toward Zion he will raise us up into glory notwithstanding the hate of men or demons.

The quaint Hebrew parallelism has it:

> "A friend loveth at all times,
> And a brother is born for adversity."

It requires adversities to test friendships even as storms prove the stability of ships. And when we have a friend who has weathered with us reverses of fortune or the aspersions of calumny and social ostracism we have one of life's greatest treasures. We have not counted all our "many blessings," if we leave our friendships out. This is one that gold can not buy nor other forms of power procure. It is the common heritage of us all. God give to us all friends who will rejoice with us when we are glad, and manfully stand by us and comfort us when we are sad.

It is well to get before us the real scope of friendship and then cultivate the help and joy it holds for the race. "Friendship is a deep, quiet, enduring affection founded upon mutual respect and esteem." Friendship is always mutual; there may be unreciprocated affection, unrequited love! but never unreciprocated or unrequited friendship; one may have friendly feelings toward an enemy, but while there is hostility or coldness on one side, there can be no friendship." "Affection may be purely natural; friendship is a growth." "Friendship is more intellectual and less emotional than love." "Friendship implies some degree of equality while love does not; we can speak of man's love toward God, but not his friendship for God."

Matt Crandal's Independence Day.

BY JESSIE CLAIRE GLASIER.

"I should like to know what a house full of girls can do to celebrate the Fourth?" said Rose, scornfully tipping her little chin up at the rest of the group. They were all in the kitchen, gathered around patient, steady-going Di, who had clucked after them like a motherly little hen ever since any of them could remember. Di's name was Diantha, really, after Grandmother Bristow, but in all her nineteen years she had scarcely ever heard it, for first it was too long for a baby, and then in two years there was wee Rose who could not get beyond the first syllable, and Annette and Georgie and little Lide had kept up the nickname, so that the faithful eldest sister would have felt a little startled, as if she had suddenly had a telegram thrust into her hand, for instance, if any one had called her by the old-fashioned name that was hers by right.

This Fourth of July morning she held an open letter in her hand. Annette, on the run, had brought it in five minutes ago from the new rural delivery box at the farm yard gate. "It's a disappointment, of course," she said, knitting her pretty eyebrows, "but mother says they'll surely be back before night. Don't cry, Lide, they'll bring the rockets and pin wheels and things. I'm sure I don't wonder Aunt Maggie wanted them to stay a few hours longer. It's the first time in years that father has been there over night—think of it! His one sister, and only ten miles away! Of course they didn't want to come right off after breakfast. We'll see old Prince's white nose at the gate before sundown, so don't feel badly, Georgie."

"And here we were going to have such a splendiferous dinner," mourned Annette. "It'll be too late when they come, and they won't want anything, anyhow, after they've been to Aunt Maggie's. I know what she'll have—chicken pie, an' creamed potatoes an' store ice cream an' everything."

"Well, we'll have something good, too," soothed Di, "and we'll have it at noon, just as usual."

"And will you let us make a platform under the big chestnut tree and s-speak our pieces and all just like we planned?" piped patriotic Georgie, who stammered under excitement.

"Yes, we'll go this minute and put out the big flag. Now Rose, don't look thorny. We'll have a good time celebrating, if there isn't a man about the place. We've always had a rousing good Fourth, and we ought to feel happier than usual because father and mother are having a real holiday."

"Who do you think is going to fix that great heavy flag pole? It's all father can manage," said Rose, with a skeptical toss of her curly head.

"Me! Let me climb out on the roof! I can help hold it," cried Annette, whose daring feats were the despair of her elders and the admiration of the little sisters.

"Yes, you'd enjoy dancing on the ridgepole, I don't doubt," laughed Di, "but nobody's neck is going to be risked if it is Independence Day. I wish we'd known earlier, before Mrs. Bantry went home, and had her ask Hen to come over before they started for town."

"And I wish we could drive over," grumbled Rose. "There'll be lots going on. I wouldn't be afraid to drive the colt."

"Now, honey, do be reasonable," coaxed Di. "You know even father wouldn't take Jerry with fire-crackers and torpedoes snapping all around. He'd bolt in five minutes and string us all along the road. Besides, we couldn't just part of us go, and suppose father and mother got home earlier than we expected and nobody to welcome them?"

"There comes somebody," cried Georgie. "Goody! It's Hen! I'm going to make him stop!" She flew down the path, followed by 5-year-old Lide, yellow locks streaming, arms waving. "Say!" she called, "Come on in and help up put out the flag! Why, you're not Hen Bantry, after all!" She stopped and looked hard at the thin face and narrow shoulders of the young man, who had halted at sound of the eager little voice. "Hen is real straight and you're stoopy," she went on, with childish frankness, "and he's all tanned up and you're so white, but you do look a lot like him. Oh, dear! I did think you were Hen!"

A friendly smile came into the stranger's black eyes. "No, I'm Matt—Matt Crandal, and quite at your service." He took off his straw hat with a bow that won the hearts of the two little girls.

"Then, can you fix it? Father and mother are away and just us girls home and it's such a big flag, and we want to c-celebrate just the s-same," Georgie cried eagerly.

Bashful little Lide peeped out from behind her sister. "I'll give you some of my fire-cwackers if you will," she promised sweetly, raising her blue eyes for one instant and then dropping them to the toe of her dusty little shoe.

"Sure! This is the day we celebrate," said the young man with an odd little laugh. "I hadn't expected to be hanging out any flags, but show me what you want and I'll take a try at it."

Georgie led the way back to the house a little slowly. Maybe Di wouldn't like it because she asked a stranger—grown-up folks were so funny about things like that. But he looked so nice out of his eyes when he smiled. Lide had hold of his hand already. Georgie faced the group in the kitchen door steadily. "This is our friend, Lide's and mine, Mr. Matthew Crandal, and he's going to put out the flag," she announced, with dignity in every line of her 8-year-old figure.

Annette's round, freckled face dimpled. "Oh! He can help make our platfrom, can't he, Di?"

Before Di could answer the stranger spoke. "I have nothing at all to do this morning—I was looking for work but I haven't found it yet, and this isn't the day to expect it. I'll be glad to help you in any way that I can. I learned carpentry when —before—" he broke off and looked down at the trustful little hand that still clasped his own. The words came in a straightforward, cheery tone, but something in the black eyes hinted at discouragement and loneliness. Warm-hearted Di took a sudden resolve. This was no ordinary tramp; he was as neat and as pleasant-mannered as Professor Simmons at the Academy. He looked as though he might have been sick; some kind of bad luck had come, and he needed heartening up. Why shouldn't he stay and eat a good dinner, now he was here? And maybe father could help him get a job, if he was a good workman.

"I'm glad you happened to come," she said cordially, "Rose, run ahead and open the attic windows. It must be stifling hot up there. All right, Lide, we'll all go up. Father always puts the flag out himself. It's heavy for any of us girls," she explained as she led the way to the stairs.

Georgia and Lide were half-way out of the open window, and Rose, in a gale of laughter, was holding fast to their skirts. "Here's where it g-goes," cried Georgie, shrilly. "Le' go, Rose, so Mr. C-crandal can l-look. That's right! I knew you'd know how," she triumphed, as after a few deft turns of the strong arms the flag-staff clicked into its socket and Old Glory spread proudly to the morning. Matt Crandal's expressive face changed as he watched the fluttering colors.

"I'll never forget when I was at the Post to see my brother—he died in the Phillippines—I saw them lower the colors at sunset. The band played "Star Spangled Banner," and every man saluted. It was still as a church. I'd have enlisted before this, but my lungs weren't up to the mark."

"It's awful healthy all 'round here, "volunteered Georgie, waving one arm widely out of window. "Look! We've got a beautiful view, everybody says. You can see 'way over to the R-reformatory down to Penfield. See? That's it 'cross the river—no, that way—that great big white building. And there's the new 'Piscopal church, and that's the road to Aunt Maggie's. Oh, I do wish our fire-crackers and things would hurry up and come."

The young workman turned to Di abruptly. "Was there anything else, before I go?" he asked in his most business-like tone.

"Oh, yes! Rose, you and Annette can show him how we meant to have it, under the tree you know. I must go and begin dinner."

The next hour was a very busy one indoors and out. While she shelled peas and moulded biscuit and pie-crust Di heard the sawing and hammering and gay clamor of voices outside in the shade of the chestnut-tree. Then came a shriek from Lide, who had dropped the hammer on her toes and could only be comforted by being allowed to turn the egg-beater madly for the holiday cake-frosting. Next came a delegation headed by the carpenter himself. "Will you please come and see if it suits?" he asked respectfully, pulling a fresh handkerchief from the pocket of his cheap new coat and wiping his flushed forehead.

Di gave a little cry of pleasure. "Of course it suits! You have made a grand platform, and how pretty those little flags look! And that wreath around Washington's picture! Warm work, wasn't it? But you'll have a few minutes to rest before dinner. "Oh, yes!" as he hesitated, "indeed we want you to stay."

When had he sat at such a merry table? Matt Crandal asked himself. Annette made them all laugh with spread-eagle speeches in honor of the day; Di kept a hospitable eye on his plate; Rose was in her brightest mood, and the two little girls filled in every pause with their chatter. Matt found himself telling a story or two under the inspiration of the occasion, and long after his appetite was satisfied he wished that the meal might last another hour for the sake of the home-like atmosphere for which he had been starving.

It was after two o'clock when Georgie mounted the flower-decked platform and announced in her clear treble, "The exercises of this afternoon will now begin with a song, 'The S-star S-spangled B-banner.' All of you sing."

A pretty group they made—Di in a simple gown that matched her clear, innocent eys; Rose in pink muslin the very hue of her cheeks; Annette in last summer's pique sailor suit much let down, her brown braids tied with poppy-red ribbons, and the two little girls proudly disporting their best white frocks, while their new friend sat on the grass at their feet, his clear baritone leading the familiar chorus.

"Now, Babe, your turn next," whispered Rose, and without waiting to be heralded Lide took her place in front of the Father of His Country, and after a hurried bob of the head lifted her eyes to the big flag and began, in her sweet voice—

> "I love this bonny flag!
> Its colors brightly glowing
> Mean peace and freedom in our land
> As on the breeze they're blowing.
> I hope its stars will ever shine
> Above this little head of mine,
> And when I'm big you'll surely see
> I'll love and serve my own countree!"

"Rose! You wrote that!" cried Annette, as Lide finished with a sweeping courtesy and ran to hide her head in Rose's lap while the rest applauded vigorously.

"It came into my head this morning while we were making the platform," confessed the budding poet, turning a shade pinker. "Didn't Babe learn it quick? Now let's sing America."

"Sheridan's Ride," delivered by Annette with much spirit, came after the song. Then Georgia, trying her best to be deliberate and smooth of tongue, gave "Breathes there a man with soul so dead." Di, from her camp-chair, read a chapter from her birthday copy of "The Man Without a Country." "Hail Columbia" came next, and then Di turned to their guest. "Won't you help us celebrate? Sing or recite something?" she urged.

"Perhaps I could get through with 'Give me liberty or give me death'—I knew it by heart long ago at school."

"Splendid! But first, let's all drink to 'Our Country'," Rose put in, appearing with an inviting pitcher of lemonade.

It is hardly to be imagined that Patrick Henry himself began his famous speech with more vigor than did Matt Crandal, inspired by the bright, friendly faces about him. As he went on he straightened himself unconsciously and threw back his dark head.

"Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs and hugging the delusive phantom of hope until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot? Sir, we are not weak if we make a proper use of those means which the God of nature hath placed in our power . . . . . The battle is not to the strong alone, it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave."

More and more impassioned grew the dark eyes, the strong young voice, till, the immortal words ended, Matt stepped down with the air of a man who has thrown a weight off his shoulders. Georgie and Lide fell upon him tumultuously.

"You're the b-best s-speaker I ever heard!" "Give us another!" "Don't you know some more?" chorused the girls. Rose drained the pitcher into his glass. "Here, drink this first!"

"Want to hear 'Sink or Swim, survive or perish?' I used to know a lot of Daniel Webster. My mother had her heart set on my being a lawyer." The glowing eyes sobered. "I learned them to please her. She was an angel of a woman. She died when I was fourteen."

"Oh! And did you give up being a lawyer?" Annette asked, her gypsy face full of sympathy.

"Yes, it wasn't any use to think of it. My stepmother didn't give me any chance at school, and I made up my mind it was better to be a good mechanic than a poor lawyer," confessed the young carpenter as he sipped his lemonade. "It takes me back, though—these old speeches. I don't know when I've thought of them before."

Jumping to his feet he began the familiar defense of the Declaration. At the words, "We shall make this a glorious, an immortal day," Lide happened to look down the dusty road.

"There they come! Now we'll have our fireworks!" she cried, and made a dash for the gate. Matt laughed as he finished opportunely, "Our children will honor it. They will celebrate it with thanksgiving, with festivity, with bonfires and illuminations."

Hospitable Mrs. Deming did not heed the few words Di whispered in her ear to make her motherly face turn to the stranger with a smile of welcome, and as soon as the kind-eyed, grizzled farmer could free himself from his clamorous little daughters he drew the young man aside with a hearty clap on the shoulder. "You've done a good piece of work here. Some men never would 'a' taken time to plane those rough old boards. I'd like to help you find steady work, an' mebby I can. You better finish out the Fourth with us—there's a good bed in the back chamber—and to-morrow we'll look around."

The thin face changed again. "Thank you, sir. I ought to tell you first. I don't know as you'll want me under your roof when you know—I just came out of the reformatory there, yesterday."

George Deming gave a shrewd glance at the younger man. "Tell me about it," he said, briefly.

"It was assault. They made it intent to kill, but I never meant that. There was a girl—I hoped to marry—Oh, I've had my lesson! She wasn't worth it, but I don't want any worse hell than what she made me suffer! I'd have trusted her around the world, and when a dirty fellow at the shop made free with her name I couldn't help it, I pitched into him. I've an awful temper when it's going once. They thought first he was killed, but he got over it. I had to stand my trial, and my stepmother, she always hated me, she told in court that I was a dangerous character." He laughed bitterly. "I've had reason enough to be angry with her, but I never yet laid hands on a woman. Well, one or two more fellows in the shop wanted to get me out before I let daylight in on some of their tricks, and they raked up everything they could. I pleaded not guilty, but by that time I'd found out about her. It was all true and a lot more, and I didn't care much what became of me. I guess I looked like a pretty tough customer. Anyway, it was either the pen or the reformatory and the judge sent me down here because he was kind-hearted and seemed to want me to have the best chance I could."

George Deming was a good reader of human nature. His generous hand still lay on Matt Crandal's shoulder. "And you mean to make the most of your chance now you're your own man again?" he asked bluntly.

"Yes, sir, I do." There was an unmistakable note of determination in Matt's voice. "I didn't know which way to turn this morning—couldn't bear to go back to the old town, and didn't know how to make a beginning. Your girls there—well, I shan't forget what this day has been to me! I felt as though everybody'd be suspecting me now, and I'd most made up my mind to tramp it awhile if I didn't get an honest job about the next time I asked. I stopped at twenty places yesterday—sometimes they treated me decent and sometimes they didn't. One man looked me over and said he'd no use for anybody of my stripe. And then there was one old lady—I don't know when anything went against the grain like her taking me for a thief. She asked me in and gave me a glass of milk, kind as could be, but just as I got out of the gate she missed her gold-bowed glasses. I told her I never set eyes on them, but I could see she didn't more than half believe me. Matt's face had hardened as he spoke..

"Le's see, now! White house, wa'n't it? Green blinds? A green house close by?" asked Farmer Deming with an odd chuckle.

"How on earth did you know?" Matt asked in turn.

"Well, you see, my sister, where ma and I've just been visiting, she's gettin' sort o' forgetful, an' she had the misfortune to lay her specs on the top shelf of the pantry, where she'd climbed up to get something, and didn't find 'em again till this morning. Then you just ought to heard her mourn over the innocent boy she'd mistrusted. Says she, 'He was a real honest, handy-looking young fellow, and I wish he'd come back and give me a chance to make up for being so quick to suspect him, when 'twas all my own fault,' she says. She's made up her mind they ought to have more help in the greenhouse, and says she, 'I'd like to try the boy if I had it to do over again!' Think you'd like that?"

A great light shone in Matt's face. "It's what I loved most down there at Penfield! They let me work with the flowers some every day all the year, and it seemed as though they understood." His voice broke suddenly.

"Well, then, that's settled!" cried the farmer cheerily. "An' now you're free an' equal, so to speak, let's have the fireworks!"

July Wishes

These sultry days I wish I were
A water lily just astir
Upon the ripples light that flow
Along the quiet pool;
Or that I were a bird, to fly
Across the blue and breezy sky,
Where merry winds forever blow
So fresh and strong and cool.

And then, again, sometimes I wish
I were a little silver fish
At play among the corals tall,
Down in the deep, cold sea.
But I am just a little lass
Curled up in grandpa's orchard grass;
And maybe that is, after all,
The nicest place to be.

The Evolution of Independence Day.

BY JANE A. STEWART.

It is interesting to review the process of development which has marked our national celebration of Independence Day. When the nation's natal day was first observed, it was the spirit of independence which was recognized. The Independence Day of the revolutionary era was peculiarly and realistically patriotic. The celebration took on the nature of a serious and solemn ceremony, while it was pre-eminently a demonstration of rejoicing.

The first celebration of independence in the United States occurred just four days after the official adoption of the Declaration of Independence by the United States Congress in Philadelphia. It was in effect a welcome and jubilee, signalizing and endorsing the new era of liberty and self government for the burdened people of the American colonies. Rejoicing was its chief feature. The people gathered as on a holiday. All labor was suspended. The military and civil authorities were out in full force. The bells rang all day and almost all night, according to no less an authority than John Adams.

Col. John Nixon, of Westchester, Pa., an ardent patriot, who had served as head of a regiment at Long Island and at Valley Forge, a prominent banker, was appointed to read the Declaration of Independence on that historic occasion. He stood on a tall erection in Independence Square (the observatory which had been built by the American Philosophical Society for its famous study of the transit of Venus) as he read in a loud, clear voice the words of the most famous of state documents. The reading was followed by the shouts and cheers of the multitude, the roll of drums, and the roar of cannon.

A special committee of nine associators removed the King's arms from the statehouse (now Independence Hall), conveying them to the top of a pile of casks erected upon the common (Independence Square) for the purpose of a bonfire. The scene around this great bonfire as the flames rose and consumed the hated emblem of kingly authority can readily be imagined. Patriotic feeling rose to a high pitch and was given vent in noisy demonstration by the less restrained part of the population.

Similar scenes, the records state, were enacted in New York and elsewhere throughout the country.. And everywhere the Declaration of Independence was received with joyful acclamation and enthusiasm, as well as with the less demonstrative evidences of appreciation of its meaning and all that it involved.

This event (in which tradition tells us the Liberty Bell bore a conspicuous part) was preliminary to the permanent introduction of the Fourth of July holiday on our national calendar.

The first real anniversary of the Declaration of Independence was held on July 4, 1777. At that time the struggle for independence was well under way, and the battles of Brandywine and Germantown were imminent. Although the outlook was grave, courage and enthusiasm for the cause of independence ran high.

The first Fourth of July celebration had the background of a current revolution and was celebrated in the atmosphere of highest patriotic purpose. There were many of the more serious minded among the populace who, no doubt, took occasion to commemorate the anniversary as the day of deliverance, as did General Washington, and to seek strength and protection by prayer and devotion in church and home.

Yet undoubtedly cheer and hope were imparted to all, also, by the public demonstrations. It is recorded that at Philadelphia the vessels in the harbor displayed all their bunting, manned their yards, formed in line of parade, and fired salutes. Congress adjourned and gave a dinner at the city tavern to civil and military authorities at which a band of Hessians captured by Washington at the battle of Trenton were the somewhat unwilling musicians.

After the banquet a military parade took place, whose chief companies were an artillery battalion, the Maryland light horse, and a North Carolina battalion. At night the bells were rung vociferously, houses were illuminated by candles set in the windows, and a display of fireworks was enjoyed. Lights, however, were ordered out at 11 o'clock, and extraordinary precautions were naturally taken to guard against fire and to prevent riots.

Ever since that initial celebration the holiday spirit has dominated Independence Day. In its evolution as a gala day it has been the occasion for the introduction of new and constantly changing recreation schemes, and unfortunately marked by abuses and excesses.

The bell ringing, the illuminations, the parade, and the fireworks still remain as perennial reminders of the early Independence Day; but other less felicitous features have been evolved.

Boat races, balloon ascensions, target shooting, the barbecue, baseball, and football are among the outdoor sports which have been received with most popular favor as features of a happy Fourth of July during succeeding years.

But noise, which was the natural concomitant of the Independence Day celebration at its very beginning, has unhappily shown no signs of remission. Instead of decreasing its volume has increased. And the rampant holiday spirit, not content with a single day of racket, has extended its ebullitions over a whole week.

As long ago as 1850, too, the problem of diminishing the danger from the increasing use of gunpowder and reducing the volume of racket and din was discussed by serious minded citizens.

As population has become more dense and cities have grown, the menace of gunpowder has been magnified. In a single recent year no less than 4,000 Independence Day injuries have been reported, about one-tenth of which caused death, in addition to several hundreds who sustained bodily mutilation by careless use of the dangerous devices introduced by inventive genius and enterprising dealers to swell the Fourth of July jollification.

This perversion of the real animus of a Fourth of July holiday is regarded as a serious indication that the people need to be reminded more strongly of the hardships and suffering that our noble and patriotic ancestors endured; and to realize more clearly the value of the inheritance that came to us from that band of sturdy statesmen who signed the Declaration of Independence and thus set an example of courage and character to the world for all ages.

This growing sentiment is having perennial manifestation in the many feasible as well as in impracticable and unpopular suggestions for "a saner Fourth of July." Chicago has set the pace for a more dignified and less dangerous observance. The funds raised it transpires were insufficient to carry out the plan, only $6,000 being subscribed when $50,000 was required. But the suggestion remains, and is open to application in modified form by local communities.

The plan, as outlined, included open celebrations in the parks, playgrounds, and vacant lots, with free selected fireworks for the children under the supervision of directors of the fetes with physicians and the fire department near at hand. A policeman, a fireman, a doctor, a teacher, and one member of the Illinois Naval Reserve in uniform (who would give the older children instruction in the use of firearms), made up the corps of attendants planned for each locality. The evening program listed a sham naval battle on Lake Michigan and a magnificent display of fireworks from several points in the city, so that as many as possible might be able to enjoy it.

A suggestion which has also won wide commendation is one which provides that in all communities (where the population is not so great as to make it impossible) all young men who have reached the age of 21 years during the year be invited to a great banquet, given seats of honor, and addressed by representative men upon the responsibilities which their coming of age imposes on them as citizens.

There is felicitous evidence that public sentiment is rising to a higher plane in its regard for the nation's natal day, in these valuable suggestions. The deadly toy pistol, the earsplitting cannon crackers, and dangerous cartridge cane have recently been legally tabooed in many enterprising communities. Other indications that a healthy reaction has set in against the incongruous features of the nineteenth century Fourth of July are happily not lacking. And in its natural evolution the celebration of Independence Day will take its appropriate place as an orderly and enthusiastic patriotic holiday.—Epworth Herald.

How to Break a Habit.

A minister offered a prize to the boy who would write the best composition in five minutes on, "How to overcome a habit." The prize went to a lad of nine years. The following is his essay:

"Well, sir, habit is hard to overcome. If you take off the first letter, it does not change 'a bit.' If you take off another, you still have a 'bit' left. If you take off still another, the whole of 'it' remains. If you take off another, it is wholly used up; all of which goes to show that if you want to get rid of habit you must throw it off altogether."

Not Up-to-Date.

Thomas Edison, Jr., is very fond of children. While on a visit to New York recently he was endeavoring to amuse the 6-year-old son of the host, when the youngster asked him to draw an engine for him.

Mr. Edison promptly set to work, and, thinking it would please the child to have an elaborate design, he added a couple of smokestacks and several imaginary parts.

When the plan was completed the boy took it and eyed it critically; then he turned to the inventor with disapproval in every feature.

"You don't know much about engines, do you?" he said with infantile frankness. "Engines may have been that way in your time, but they've changed a whole lot since then."

Jes' Plain Torpedoes.

The good old Fourth's a-comin'—the best day in the year,
And little chaps get anxious-like, when once it's drawin' near;
They talk of firecrackers and they dream about the noise,
The dear old Fourth was certainly jes' made fer little boys.
Bill's got a great big cannon, with fuse you have to light,
And lots of great big crackers that's filled with dynamite;
But I'm a little feller—ain't half as old as he,
And I guess that plain torpedoes will have to do fer me!

Pa says that giant crackers ain't fit fer little chaps.
He's sore on all toy pistols and hates these paper caps.
He don't intend his children shall ever celebrate
By blowin' off their fingers—he says they'll have to wait.
"You're nothin' but a baby," my father says, "as yet,
And your dady can't quite spare you; he needs you bad, you bet.
Bill's got some giant crackers? Well, that I know is true,
But I guess that plain torpedoes will have to do fer you."

It's hard to have big brothers and watch them at their play,
And jes' to be a little chap and sort o' in the way;
To have folks always tell you, you can't do thus and so,
Because you're jes' a little chap—not old enough, you know.
But ma, she sees I'm tearful, so she takes me in her lap
And says, "Why, what's the matter, you're cryin,' little chap."
Then, as she bends to kiss me, I'm brave as I can be,
I guess that plain torpedoes are good enough for me!

The Bronze Vase.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

PART III.

CHAPTER I.

Raymund Revore thrust his sister's letter into his pocket and started toward the Omer mansion with an agitated step. He met the farmhand, Tom, coming from the massive brick residence. Tom, catching sight of the youth's face, exclaimed, "Don't you worry about having to leave this farm, Raymund. You won't have any trouble finding a job, and you'll get more than Mr. Omer ever gave you, too!"

"It isn't that," said Raymund, speaking rapidly. "A letter has just come from Rhoda. She has gone to work for a lady in Kansas City, and she is in trouble, somehow. She wants me to come to her at once. I'm going on the first train."

"We'll walk to Crawley together," said Fred, coming up. "I'm leaving for town." Raymund hurriedly gathered together his few possessions, and made them into a bundle. He left the bundle in Tom's care to be taken to Brother Bellfield's. Tom and Baby would be driven to Crawley the next day.

"I guess it's goodby," said Tom, as Raymund and Fred hesitated in the doorway. Raymund carried the green umbrella under one arm, and a little package of what he deemed necessities, swung from his hand.

"I guess it is," said Fred in his high key. "It's the lonesomest word in the language, I reckon." He stroked his whiskers to conceal his emotion. "Tom, you and me has lived and worked together four year, ain't we?"

"Yep," said Tom, nervously scraping the ground with one of his huge boots, and stooping to look at the mark he had made.

"Well," said Fred, "be good to yourself, Tom."

Just then Baby, now a boy of six in his first trousers, came from around the house. "Come here, kid, and tell me goodby!" cried Fred, setting his weather-beaten valise in the path.

"Goodby," said Baby; "b'ing me something dood!"

"Was they ever such a kid!" cried Fred, grinning. He bent his knees slightly outward, slowly lit his pipe and stared at the child in speechless admiration. Baby finding himself the center of observation gave a shout and turned a summersault.

"Well," said Tom, presently, "if Raymund wants to ketch that there train, we'd better shake hands and part." Then they shook hands all around, very mournfully and Tom said to Raymund with deep feeling, "Be good to yourself!"

"Thank you," said Raymund, stooping to give Baby a final hug. Then he and Fred set forth upon their tramp to town. When the high road was gained they looked back. The sun was shining upon the mansion where Raymund had gone day after day to learn Latin and French. It was June and the roses bloomed near the spot where he and Jack Bellfield had parted from Nelsie Loraine, the night of his thirteenth birthday. The Hands' House was in sight and in the doorway stood Tom waving his red bandana, while Baby, with no troubles of his own, and callous to the troubles of others, was strutting in his new trousers. "Was they ever sich a kid!" exclaimed Fred with a sigh. It was a silent walk to Crawley. There was no time to lose and Raymund intrusted Fred with messages to be delivered to the Bellfields. "I may bring Rhoda back home to-morrow," he said; "tell Brother Bellfield I may have to ask him to take her in for a little while, until I can find something to do. I know he will be willing."

As they neared Crawley they heard the whistle of an engine. "Train's comin,'" cried Fred shrilly. They began to run. Fortunately their road approached Crawley from the side where the station stood. As they panted up to the side platform the engine bell was ringing. There was no time to buy a ticket. Raymund wrung Fred's hand and jumped aboard. As he found his seat the train started. Raymund looked out and Fred shouted from the platform, "Be good to yourself!" Then the outskirts of Crawley whisked out of sight.

Raymund wished he had known of this departure only the day before, when he had been in Crawley. Then he could have told all his friends goodby. But he had been in such a hurry on that day he had only taken time to draw the money on Mr. Omer's hundred-dollar check. He had taken most of it in bank notes, and with one of his five-dollar bills he paid his way to Kansas City, receiving in change a little over two dollars. With the caution of one unused to the city, he had disposed of his money in various parts of his garments. There was a ten-dollar bill in the bottom of each of his shoes. Seventy dollars were sewed in a little pocket of his undershirt. In spite of this caution he was on the alert for thieves and confidence men. He and Rhoda were but six years old when their widowed mother brought them from St. Louis to Crawley. Since then Raymund had never ridden on a train, and, of course, had never been in a city. The ride through strange fields, over high trestle work and across the wide Missouri river, made his brain hum with strange sensations. When they rolled into Kansas City, the bewildering sights and clanging sounds dazed him. He thought he must leave the car when they drew among the many-storied buildings, but the train went on and on till it seemed they would never stop in Kansas City, but would go on to another place. Even when a man came on board and requested, or rather demanded, to check their baggage, it was no use for Raymund to get up and start down the aisle, for the train kept right on.

"Baggage? Baggage?" said the man, rattling his brass checks and hovering over Raymund as if with half a mind to check him.

"No," Raymund apologized, "I have no baggage but this little bundle."

"I'll check the little bundle," said the man, drawing forward his cap to have a better look at the boy.

"I don't think it is worth while," said Raymund.

"Not worth while? Of course it is worth while! Now, where do you want to go? Do you want a carriage?"

"I don't want anything checked," said Raymund in a determined voice.

"Then why didn't you say so at first?" scowled the man. "Let me by, will you?" Raymund was not at all in the way, but he made no reply. At last the train did stop, and the people began to pour out as if they fancied there would be an attempt on the part of the train crew to hold them as prisoners. Raymund did not like to squeeze himself into the throng for fear of being crowded upon some lady or child. But after he had waited a good while and everybody else was pushing himself or herself forward with no regard for those who might be inconvenienced by their frenzied eagerness, Raymund left his seat and allowed himself to be borne along with the rest. There was so much noise from the outside, such deafening hiss of escaping steam, and rush of truck wheels and clash of high voices that Raymund could hear nothing distinctly. In front of him was a very fat man who perspired freely and who turned his bald head occasionally in his direction. Finally Raymund reached the wooden flooring that extended under the great shed, and as he did so the fat man seized him by the elbow and shouted in his ear, "You give me just one more jab with that miserable umbrella of yours, sir, and I'll break it over your head!" Then Raymund realized that when the fat man's lips had been moving it was not merely to gasp for air but to remonstrate against the infliction of physical injuries.

"I beg your pardon," said Raymund, reversing the umbrella.

"And it does no good when you do," said the fat man, mopping his brow and still glaring. "You have made my leg black and blue, sir!"

Raymund crimsoned with shame and hastened away. He did not know which way to go, but it was his intention to escape the fat man. He followed the crowd

REGIMENTAL REUNIONS AND FORTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY BATTLE CHICKAMAUGA,

CHATTANOOGA, SEPTEMBER 18-20, 1906.

On September 18, 1906, will occur the forty-third anniversary of the Battle of Chickamauga. It is proposed to celebrate this memorable event with a reunion of the various regiments that participated in this memorable battle and the various battles fought around Chattanooga. This reunion will be held at Chickamauga National Park, September 18, 19 and 20, and the present indications are that it will be the largest and most notabe gathering ever held in the South. On the above dates, the remnants from the armies of twelve states, comprising the following: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Kentucky, will assemble, many for the first and last time since they marched from its blood-stained fields, forty-three years ago.

Here is one of the great opportunities for the education of the youth. Don't fail to take your children and show them historic Chattanooga, with all its historical connections. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Go and see the old war generals and other officers point out the places of interest on the battlefield; let them show you and explain, in person, the markers erected on the battlefield showing the positions of the opposing armies at the time of battle. It will not be long until none will be left to do this noble work.

It will be many years, if ever again, that such an opportunity will present itself. See that your tickets read via the Louisville & Nashville R. R., the Battlefield Route. Call on your nearest railroad agent for rates and advertising matter pertaining to the reunion, or write nearest representative of the Louisville & Nashville R. R.

which swept toward the iron gates. Presently he was walking along the flooring outside the Union Station, uncertain which of its many doors to enter. He presently tried one and found himself in a vast chamber which was thronged with people. Around the ticket windows was a solid mass, and at one side was another packed crowd, above the heads of which an official was shouting names. Whenever he called a name somebody in the crowd would respond. Raymund approached a man in uniform and asked how he could find the street. The officer stared at him crossly and said he didn't know, and walked away. It was nearing twilight and Raymund was uneasy lest he should fail to reach the house where Rhoda was staying, before dark. He was in a hurry to go out into the city, but the crowd prevented him from seeing that just across the room the door opened upon the street. He accosted another official with his inquiry and was again told, "I don't know." Just then the mass of excited travelers parted a little and he looked through a glass door and saw what he had been asking about.

On the street he inquired of a policeman the way to the house where Rhoda was working. The direction staggered him. He was told to go to a certain street, take a street car and be sure to get a transfer ticket to another car, and from it get a transfer ticket to another car, and so on till he came to Pennsylvania avenue, where he was to walk until he reached the house in question. If there was no misadventure he ought to reach his destination in an hour. Raymund had heard a vague mention of transfer tickets, but he did not know how or where to procure one. He believed from the tone of Rhoda's letter that no time was to be lost in reaching her, and he started upon his perplexing journey with dauntless resolution. He was so evidently from the country that those near him on the various street cars seemed, as they looked at him, to smell newmown hay, and hear the cows coming home to be milked. It was at least two hours before he stood in front of a respectable looking three-story brick, waiting for his ring to be answered. Already the street lights were lit, and the gathering darkness filled Raymund with uneasy foreboding. He heard some one raise a window above his head. He looked up and there was Rhoda! He had not seen her for three years. The tears came to his eyes. Her head disappeared like a flash. Almost immediately it seemed to him the door was flung open and Rhoda's arms went about his neck, and she was sobbing convulsively. "Oh, Raymund! Raymund!" she gasped. "Oh, Raymund! It is you! I knew you would come, I knew it! Come, quick!"

She shut the door behind her and they stood on the steps. She was barefooted. Her dress was in rags. Her head was uncovered. The miserable skirt came only a little way below her knees. Her face and hands and bare arms, as well as her feet, were soiled with streaks of soot. The light hair, once his mother's pride, was tangled and dingy. His heart stood still.

"Why, Rhoda!" he exclaimed. "What is the matter?"

"Quick! Quick!" panted Rhoda, dragging him away. "Let us get from this place as soon as possible. I will tell you all about it when we are safe."

She had grown up into a tall, slim girl of fifteen, but Raymund feared she had lost all her beauty. He could not be sure because she was so wretched of attire, so careless of her person and the street was so dark.

"Where will we go?" he asked in perplexity.

"I don't know," said Rhoda, still struggling to suppress her sobs.

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
  Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
  The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
  For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
  Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
  And the song of victory.

1809 CENTENNIAL PROPAGANDA 1909
CHURCHES OF CHRIST

: : : GEO. L. SNIVELY : : :

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

The material interests of the Churches of Christ should receive more and immediate attention from those Disciples fondly hoping to make of our Centennial convention one of the memorable events of modern church history.

One of the greatest deficiencies in our equipment is that of attractive church edifices in our cities. We have heretofore been largely a country folk. We have so long hesitated to follow Paul into the great cities that the present cost of land and building material has almost barred us from fellowship in the thrilling enterprise of winning our opulent cities and making them mighty fortresses of our holy religion. We must make extraordinary efforts to compensate for lost time. May we not utilize the inspiration of our Centennial to this end?

There are state capitals where we have no church, but it is questionable whether there is one where there are not enough disciples or people who have been disciples to form the nucleus of a good church. The sine qua non of a Church of Christ in that strategic center of the life of the commonwealth is a building. Some where in the State is a brother amply endowed with funds to rear a Centennial memorial church perpetuating not only the fact that he lived, loved, and served in the world, but also that he loved and served wisely and well.

There are scores of county seats in which the cause of primitive Christianity is languishing for lack of a church home into which to collect our families as they move into these minor but important capitals from villages and farms.

In the heart of Brother Ireland, whose timely article follows, has been born the great idea of Centennial memorial churches to overcome the handicap under which we labor in multiplying apostolic churches in America. Let press and preachers, our secretaries and convention committees on ways and means foster this idea and unite in bringing "Pittsburg pressure" to bear on men and women of means to build a great multitude of beautiful and enduring monuments in the form of Centennial churches in our capitals and great cities.

A good example is more contagious than disease. If some one will promptly volunteer Centennial memorial church number one, we confidently predict many another such house will follow in quick succession of time that to thousands will be veritable gates of heaven.

Though Brother Osterhus' plea for the sons and daughters of the ancient Vikings is longer than can usually be allowed for the consideration of one matter in a single issue, because of its great importance it is given space, and we bespeak for it a thoughtful reading by all. From other sources we have confirmations of his statements that among the millions of brave, sincere, and naturally religious Scandinavians in this country are many thousands hungering for those truths unmixed with error of which the Churches of Christ are the repositories in trust. Loyalty to this trust involves our fellowship with Brothers Osterhus, Stone and other great-hearts in feeding the souls of these Norsemen-Americans with the bread of life. It is true a multitude of calls come to us for help every week, but many busy themselves more in evading all these calls than in helping answer any one of them. Will not some of our readers make actual personal sacrifices in order to give our heroic brother the advantages of a printing press in disseminating the Gospel among his countrymen?. We hope many will pray and earnestly labor to the end that these people may become possessed of a religion that will comfort and satisfy their souls and make them great and holy in the Lord.

Is it not fitting, too, we should take some steps for the redemption of the thousands of Greeks who are crowding to our shores in these latter years? Their fathers gave us the plastic language in which will forever be enshrined the Master's words of life. We have done nothing as yet to discharge our obligations to that virile race. Let us interpret to them meanings locked in their own vernacular that will prove their redemption from vice and coronation at the right hand of One infinitely greater than the Jove of their marvelous ancestors.

Italy, also, rallied to the defense of Christianity at a time when to all human appearances it would otherwise have been exterminated. From her shores are annually coming hordes who so need God and his righteousness and the help we can best administer to free them from superstition and vice. China, Japan, Africa and Lo, the poor red man from our own western plains, appeal to us through their actual needs if they confess it not with the lips or know their want.

Let us widen our vision so as to include in plans for Centennial helpfulness not only native sons but all whose feet press our soil. Let us have a congress of nations at Pittsburg in 1909 at whose sessions many dialects will be employed to tell of the greatness of God's love manifested through these churches of Christ, and giving undesigned evidence of the universality of the triumphs of redeeming grace accomplished by the power of the truth abiding in this Restoration.

Memorial Buildings for Our Centennial.

BY GILBERT E. IRELAND.

As our great brotherhood looks toward "Pittsburg and 1909," the fervor rises and spreads like surging tide and whelming flood. Great purposes and dauntless resolution wherewith to fulfill them are everywhere apparent. Indications assure us that the next three years will be "big with enterprises" far eclipsing all our past successes. Evangelistic meetings ablaze over all the land, bringing multitudes of converts to confess the Son of God; increase in missionary offerings, that the church may be built up in the dear homeland and the Gospel be spread in far-away regions by ancient rivers and over palmy plains; the raising of church debts, lifting the burden that is crushing many a congregation; the endowment of colleges, that the young men of the future may be more completely equipped than were the best of their predecessors: O, what great things are on the program of our brotherhood! Highly favored are we who live in these magnificent times. Not divided by debateable questions, but knit together more firmly as we realize with grateful pride how wide our liberty is to differ, yet ever at one in loyalty to the Son of God, as we bend the knee and doff the helm to our Glorious Commander, while down all our long and eager line there swells the acclaim, "Crown Him Lord of All!"

Added to these and other achievements that lie just before us, is not this a most appropriate time for the building of memoral churches? With the waning of 1909, and when the great Pittsburg convention shall pass away in echoes, why should not memorial buildings thickly stud the land? I am encouraged in my own work by the prospect of a Centennial building for this southern part of St. Louis. This field is exceedingly difficult, more so than any I have known elsewhere, all its conditions make it so. Often have we felt that we must surely let go our hold upon it, but always has the vision of a strong, great future for this congregation held us fast. A church in the years that are coming which shall be a trysting place for a host of believers; a center of holy influence for young and old; a church where "the people" shall find light and rest and strength. This has been the vision, night and day. And now this hope is almost changed into sight. The city mission board has resolved to center its efforts largely on this point and give it a "Centennial Building" by 1909. We have secured a most eligible lot, beautiful for situation and important as a strategic point. A minister of a neighboring church, finely situated and equipped, said to me, "I wish it were our church going there." Members of another church offered us handsome contributions if we would come and build close to their homes, but this yet superior lot is selected for the Centennial building.

Could not such buildings be made a feature of our next three years' campaign? How sacred the spot, wherever chosen, for such a house of God. In memory of some dear departed one, whose saintly name of mother, or wife, or child, or friend, shall be made yet more holy as it is enshrined and perpetuated in a temple devoted to the worship of God and the preaching of his Gospel. Or, if not affection's tribute to the memory of one whom you "have loved and lost awhile," let it be devotion's offering in celebration of the century of wonder-

The Close of Congress.

The first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress closed Saturday night, June 30. It was a record-breaking session for the amount of its appropriations, which were approximately $875,000,000, the number of bills introduced, which amounted to 27,600, and the volume of talk, which was no less than 40,000,000 words as recorded in the Congressional Record. The most important bills of the session, some of which had been before congress for the entire seven months of its duration, were passed at the last moment. The bill empowering the interstate commerce commission to review the rates of railroads and other common carriers, the pure food bill, the meat inspection bill, and the federal naturalization bill were all enacted into laws. The difference between the Senate and the House on the meat bill was removed by the former's accepting the provision that the government should bear the expense of the inspection and abandoning the demand for dated labels on canned products. The appropriation for carrying on the work on the Panama Canal carried with it the determination that the canal shall be of the lock type with an 80-foot level. The new state of Oklahoma was created and provision made for joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico if both territories accept the offer. This will dispose of the last of the territories, except those which may be organized in our non-contiguous possessions. The consular service was re-organized; Niagara Falls were protected by limiting the amount of water which may be diverted for power; and an employer's liability law was enacted. After all that one feels compelled to say during the session about the dilatory tactics of congress, it must be admitted that this is a considerable body of important legislation. Most of it is in the direction of abolishing special privileges and compelling avaricious dividend-seekers to observe a decent regard for the rights of the public. Besides these acts that have been enumerated, congress passed about 300 others of a general or public nature, and nearly 4,000 private bills, mostly pension grants. The most important bills that failed to pass both houses were the Philippine tariff bill, the ship subsidy bill and the bills prohibiting compaign contributions by corporations and requiring publicity in campaign receipts and expenditures.

The President will go to Panama for a three weeks' trip next October. This will be about as near as any President ever came to passing outside of the boundaries of the United States. It will be a great wonder if Mr. Roosevelt does not shatter that tradition before his term of office expires. With his new appropriation of $25,000 for traveling expenses he could afford to take a summer trip to Europe.

Pleasant Reading.

The Topeka Public Library, according to newspaper reports, has barred out Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle" on the ground that it is a very unpleasant book. As newspaper dispatches about this sort of thing are not always either complete or accurate, we do not care to make special application of these remarks to the Topeka library board, but the incident serves as occasion for saying a thing that needs to be said often to the American reader. Pleasantness is not the criterion of excellence in literature. The contrary belief is doing more than anything else to degrade current literature and especially current fiction. A humorous book, which gladdens the heart, unburdens the mind and agitates the diaphragm to wholesome laughter, is always justifiable. But a merely pleasant book, which flows along from one triviality to another, neither offending the taste nor stimulating the mind, a bas with such. Literature must be a transcript of life—a very hackneyed statement, but still true. It must also be a transcript of life that is worth transcribing. That includes good life, bad life, high life, low life, but not the life which has nothing to recommend it except the fact that it is pleasant. If literature can be pleasant while it is also vital, so much the better. But as mere pleasantness can not make, so unpleasantness can not mar a book. "The Jungle" is not great literature, but it is alive. It touches things as they are and is quickened by the author's vision (right or wrong) of things as they should be. To ask, as a question of first importance, whether it is pleasant, is a sheer impertinence.

A beer advertisement that is appearing in current papers quotes a certain Rev. Alexis W. Stein, an Episcopal rector, as saying that he is in favor of the use of beer. Perhaps the Rev. Mr. Stein is a belated convert to Bishop Potter's subway tavern scheme. Or again, perhaps he is only following the evil leadings of his own name.

Fireworks.

Some days before the Fourth it was estimated that not less than twelve million dollars would be burned up in fireworks in celebrating our independence. And this did not include the inevitable losses from accidental fires which add to the glare of the Glorious Fourth, but are not exactly freewill offerings on the altar of Liberty. Twelve millions for fireworks! Enough to build and endow a first-rate university or a dozen good colleges. Enough to establish a number of free hospitals and dispensaries, or build a thousand moderate-priced churches, or support several "national theaters," which some people are so much interested in, or support all the foreign missionaries sent out from this Christian country, or do a great many other things. Is it a wise expenditure? Probably not. But certainly it is no more foolish than any sermon against it would be. If the buyers of fireworks were moved solely by patriotic motives, perhaps they would all put their money into one big fund and appoint commissioners to decide how it could be spent for the best interest of the nation. But this would be absurd. They don't spend the money for patriotism but for fun. So if they gave this twelve millions for establishing hospitals or colleges they would have to spend some more for their fun and there would be another twelve million wasted. So let us not worry about the waste on fireworks, nor about the other vast aggregates of apparently wasteful expenditure on little things. How much do the men of this country waste on the useless buttons on their coat sleeves? There are, say, 30,000,000 boys and men who wear coats. Two coats a year for each; two buttons on each sleeve of each coat; altogether 240,000,000 useless buttons every year. At 10 cents a dozen, $2,000,000. But, pshaw! This method of reasoning would bring us all to blankets and barbarism in a year. On with the fireworks! The boys enjoy them, and so do all the rest of us. And perhaps every year five or six people in various parts of the country stop to ask themselves what is it all about.

Count Boni de Castellane has fallen upon evil days. His wife, who was Anna Gould, is trying to get a divorce from him, and with every prospect of success. And now he has been expelled from his seat in the Chamber of Deputies on the charge of bribing and corruption. This is rather a backset to a young man whose ambition is to be president of France.

Bryan vs. Roosevelt.

The recrudescence of Bryanism is one of the wonders of modern politics. It was generally supposed that after the disastrous defeats of the "first and second battles," he would "stay put" out of further political consideration, but now his unanimous nomination by the next Democratic convention is universally conceded. It is questionable whether this nomination will be an endorsement of what is generally known as Bryanism. Vilas (of Wisconsin), Francis, Watterson, and indeed nearly all the prominent gold-winged Democrats, have declared for him but not for double standard Bryanism. These old-time Democrats defend their championship for Bryan in the third battle by saying that age, travel and study have broadened Bryan and made him more conservative. Bryan himself attributes their championship to their progress in knowledge of real political conditions. The feeling is growing that Roosevelt is the only Republican who can defeat him. Millions would hail with delight an opportunity to vote for the President's re-election, even if it would "Mexicanize this Republic." Those next the President, however, say he stands thoroughly committed to his signed statement sent out on election night, 1904, that he would not be a candidate to succeed himself. Taft, Root, Foraker, Fairbanks, Shaw and other aspirants have been given to understand by Roosevelt that the field was open and they and their friends have laid plans for securing delegates to capture the nomination on their faith in his word. A campaign between Bryan and Roosevelt would be the most picturesque in the annals of American politics. Bryan has signified his willingness to accept the nomination. Will the Republicans take the matter out of the hands of the President and against his wishes make it Bryan vs. Roosevelt?

Christian Union: A Historical Study.

IV. The Protestant Era; The Period of Reunion.

14. How Shall the Union of Christians Come About?

If our premises have been true in the preceding articles, and the unity of Christians is rendered certain by the operation of the law of life within the Church, and by the mighty motives from without which appeal to the inner law of life, the question still obtrudes itself, how is it to come about? Indeed, there are those who lay so much stress upon the how of Christian union that they become skeptical about the fact, because they do not understand all the process. When certain Christians of Paul's day asked, "How are the dead raised and with what manner of body do they come?" the apostle replied, with a little sharpness, "Thou foolish one, that which thou thyself sowest is not quickened except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that shall be, but the bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other kind; but God giveth it a body even as it pleased him, and to each seed a body of its own."

There is an implication in this reply of the apostles that it is a very foolish thing for a Christian to doubt the possibility of God's carrying out his promises to us, because we can not see just how he will do it, or just what we shall be when he has done it. Would not the same great Christian philosopher, if he were on earth to-day, reply to the question which is so often raised, "How will Christian union come about, and what will the united Church be like?" in very much the same way? We, of course, know more about the process of Christian union than that of the resurrection, because the latter is wholly God's work, while in the matter of Christian union we are to co-operate with God. The things revealed to us, however, relate to what manner of Christians we are to be, how we may cultivate the spirit of unity, and in what essential elements Christian unity consists. There remains much left for faith, as to what changes God is going to lead his people through in order to their unification, and the exact nature of the form which that union shall take. If, however, there be the unity of the Spirit, God will give it a body as it pleaseth him.

There are some things, however, that are reasonably sure concerning the nature of that union that shall be. We call attention to a few of these characteristics.

1. The union must be vital, not mechanical. It must grow; it can not be manufactured. There can be no union among Christ's followers except as they are united with him and share in his life and enter into fellowship with his plans and purposes. We may promote its growth by deepening the spiritual life and by removing obstacles out of the way; but we may not force it, or seek to hasten it beyond the law of spiritual development.

2. It must be Christian union. That is to say, Christ must be the center of it and the circumference of it. He must be supreme, and no man must divide authority with him. A division in authority is certain to perpetuate existing divisions and may result in new ones. It is only by following a common master that we can have unity; and it is only by following Christ as that Master that we can have Christian unity. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ."

3. The union which Christ prayed for and which is essential to the world's conversion, is not the union of denominations, having differing creeds, tests of fellowship, party names and party ambitions. Federation is not Christian union, though we believe it is an important step in that direction. We owe it to the Christ who prayed for the unity of his followers, that in so far as we have attained to unity in faith and purpose and doctrine, we seek to manifest it to the world in such co-operation as that unity makes possible; but we must not mistake the co-operation of distinct denominational bodies for Christian union, as Jesus prayed for it.

4. It is safe to say that Christian union is not to come about by any one religious body absorbing all other religious bodies. No doubt that hope is cherished by many in almost all the religious bodies of Christendom, but it is a hope destined never to be realized. Such a union would be both impracticable and undesirable. No religious body in Christendom is organized on a basis to adequately utilize and direct the religious forces of Christendom and administer wisely its vast interests. If history teaches anything, it teaches that this is not God's method of bringing about Christian union. No doubt he has a more excellent way which in time will commend itself to the approval of all his real followers. If we may judge from the history of the past what the divine plan of bringing about that unity of Christians is to be, it is their gradual approximation to a common divine standard, in which, as they come nearer to that standard, they necessarily come nearer to each other. That is the process which we see going on before our eyes and we have no right to suppose that any different plan is to be adopted. There will be a growing consciousness of the evils of division, which is only partially realized as yet; a growing sense of the need of unity, together with a clearer recognition among various religious bodies of the truths they already hold in common. With the growth in Christian knowledge and in spiritual discernment there will come new estimates of spiritual values, and a readjustment of doctrinal conceptions more in harmony with the mind of Christ, which will open the way for continuous progress toward unity. Denominational peculiarities will shrink to their proper dimensions, while the great fundamentals of Christian faith and character will rise to their true places, and this will bring the whole body of believers into closer fellowship and co-operation. This process is to be mightily stimulated by the free intermingling of Christians and their working together for common ends.

5. Christian union, when it comes, will not be uniformity. There will be room in it for differences of opinion, different methods of work and worship, different forms of organization and different degrees of emphasis. No other sort of union is possible among a free people, nor would it be desirable. Life everywhere takes on a variety of forms, and it must be so in the kingdom of God. Nature furnishes us infinite variety, and yet underlying it all is a wonderful unity. But we must get rid of the notion that this variety of opinions and freedom of action within the limitations of the spirit and teaching of Christ involves separate and distinct religious denominations. That idea belongs to the childhood period of the church. We are coming more and more to understand that if we have the common faith that unites us to Christ, that makes us obedient to him, we may hold differences of opinion, and work and worship in different ways, without interfering with our oneness in Christ or our fellowship with each other. How far denominational lines will be obliterated, and present forms of organization modified, in order to the realization of New Testament unity, is a question which would be answered differently by persons occupying different points of view; but one thing, we think, may be said with assurance, and that is that in so far as our existing denominationalism interferes with the freest and fullest fellowship between Christians, and with their hearty co-operation in advancing the kingdom of God by the diversion of resources or purely sectarian purposes, or by confusing the minds of those without by our differing names and creeds, it must give way to that unity of faith and purpose, of spirit and life, that subordinates everything else to the triumph of the kingdom of God on earth.

"One Baptism:" What Is It?

The Apostle Paul tells us in his list of unities in the Ephesian letter that there is "one baptism." What is it? One class of writers tells us it is Spirit baptism, and hence baptism in water is out of date. Another class tells us it is water baptism and, therefore, Spirit baptism is out of date. Both of them, in our judgment, are wrong. It is Christian baptism that is meant, and Christian baptism is neither Spirit-alone baptism, nor water-alone baptism, but a baptism in which both the water and the Spirit are united.

This agrees with the statement of Jesus in his famous conversation with Nicodemus: "Except one be born of water and the Spirit he can not enter into the kingdom of God." The baptism that admits into the kingdom of God is a birth in which, in its proper scriptural form, the body is buried in water and the Spirit comes into union with and under the control of the Holy Spirit. Nicodemus had probably heard of the baptism of John, and was willing to accept it if that would suffice to bring him into harmony with this new Teacher, whom he recognized as one sent from God. Jesus tells him plainly that baptism in water does not suffice, but that the Holy Spirit has a necessary part in the important change, and that there must be a birth, both of the water and of the Spirit. This explains, too, why water is mentioned first in the passage. Jesus is following the historical order. John's baptism came first, and after that, as John prophesied, Jesus came with another baptism which John could not administer. Even the least of those who were subjects of Christ's baptism was greater than John the Baptist.

With this also agrees the statement of Paul in another place: "For in one Spirit were we all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free, and were all made to drink of one Spirit." (1. Cor. xii. 13). This was Paul's explanation of the unity of the "one body," namely: that all had been baptized with one Spirit, whether Jews or Greeks, bond or free, and were all made to drink of this one Spirit. It is self-evident that no mere baptism in water, without the corresponding action of the Spirit, would have accomplished the unification of these diverse elements that entered into the early church. In perfect harmony with this is Paul's reference to Christian baptism in his celebrated passage in the sixth of Romans, in which he argues that those who have been "buried with Christ in baptism" in the "likeness of his death" can not continue their old life of sin in order that grace may abound. It was the death to sin, accomplished through the action of the Spirit, that makes continuance in a life of sin impossible. The form of baptism is only incidental, in this passage; the main point in its spiritual significance.

It is a great pity that the church in its controversy over the form of baptism has well nigh lost its deeper spiritual meaning, until one scarcely associates with it its real significance—a deeper and truer consecration to God. The burial of the body in water means the submergence of the human spirit in the divine Spirit. It is time for us all to put away the controversial spirit in dealing with this vital subject and come to it on our knees, for a fresh study of it, that we may learn anew what the Apostle Paul taught the Romans, Corinthians and Ephesians, long ago, that our baptism commits us to a life of thorough consecration to God, of death to sin, and of union with Christ and with each other. This is the true relation of baptism to the union problem.

Admirers of Mark Twain believe he has never written anything more effective than the little verse he had cut in the modest block of marble which marks the resting-place of his wife in Woodlawn Cemetery, Elmira, N. Y.:

Warm summer sun,
  Shine kindly here;
Warm southern wind,
  Blow softly here.
Green sod above,
  Lie light, lie light.
Good-night, dear heart,
  Good-night, good-night.

Current Religious Thought.

At the request of many readers we reopen this department. Perhaps nothing else we could cull would inform us of a more practical, helpful idea being cherished by our religious contemporaries than the following from the "Chicago Record-Herald:"

A movement is on foot in New York City to secure a rule by the board of education providing for nonsectarian religious instruction in the public schools. An organization has been formed for the purpose of promoting a movement against what are called "Godless public schools." Prominent among the leaders are several Jewish rabbis, several Catholic priests and representatives of the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches. It is proposed that the curriculum of the public schools be arranged so as to include at least one lesson a week on the great truths that are accepted by all denominations, and that a lesson in moral philosophy be given twice a week.

Bishop Greer, who is quite active in the movement, says: "There must be moral and religious training among the children of our public schools if we expect to continue to be a righteous nation. I am a strong believer in the public schools. I approve them as they are, and for what they stand for. They serve a great patriotic purpose in educating children of nearly every race in the world and making Americans of them. I know of one school where seventeen different nationalities are represented among the pupils. These schools are not entirely godless. They can not be where they have God-fearing teachers, and most of the teachers I know by their characters alone are exerting a wholesome moral, if not a religious, influence. That is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. Moral training rests upon the knowledge and the reverence of a divinity, and every race believes in and every religion is based upon the recognition of a supreme being. And no harm can be done by teaching the children of the public schools their responsibility to their Creator."

Rabbi Mendes, who is a member of the committee, says that the Jews will gladly support the movement for "three new Rs" and want their children instructed in "Reverence, Righteousness and Responsibility," as well as in reading, 'riting and 'rithmetic. "This generation is irreverent," he says, "and irreverence leads to unrighteousness and immorality. We must not neglect to teach the masses of children that are thronging our public schools their obligations to their Creator and the object of their conscience."

Father McMillan, of the Paulist Catholic educational order, says that there will be no objection on the part of the members of his faith if character building is introduced into the public schools, and that the basis of all character is a recognition of a supreme power and reverence for religion. On account of religious differences we shall have to be very careful in preparing a text-book, but it will be easy. Everybody but atheists must readily admit the necessity of moral education, and religion is the basis of all morals."

The committee is now preparing a text-book which will be submitted to the criticism of clergymen of the different denominations, Protestant, Catholic, Jews and Greeks, and their indorsement will be obtained before the matter is brought into the Board of Education. It has been thought best to settle the question as to what shall be taught before asking official permission to teach anything. If the proposed text-book commands the approval of every religious denomination the Board of Education naturally will feel less delicacy in treating the subject. One of the committee said that it would be based upon the Ten Commandments and the additional commandments proposed by the Savior.

Notes and Comments.

Here is another report from the "firing line." It comes from the south, where the "firing" is supposed to be the fiercest. The attack is from the Methodists, and shows how our cause is sometimes assailed in the Sunny South. Through the courtesy of Bro. Claude E. Hill, our preacher at Mobile, Ala., we are permitted to publish this letter from the Methodist pastor at Whistler, Ala., a town of about 2,000 population, ten miles from Mobile. The letter is addressed to Rev. Claude E. Hill, Mobile, Ala., under date of June 26, and reads as follows:

> Dear Sir and Brother—There are some of your "flock" out here who desire a service from you. I told some of them that I would write and ask you in regard to the matter. If you can arrange to come the Methodist Church will be at your service. I know your time is well taken up with duties in town, but these out here would be glad to get a week night service from you. Write me what time to announce for you. Hoping that you are well and happy, I am yours fraternally,
> A. B. Brown, Pastor Methodist Church.

Brother Hill writes that he has never met this pastor, so far as he knows, but he evidently suspects no "trap," and is going out to preach in the Methodist Church, as invited. The fact is, Brother Hill writes, that all the religious bodies thereabouts "have been uniformly kind and courteous" and that he has no complaint whatever to make of the cause having been "slandered or misrepresented." This incident is refreshing. Of course, "it takes more than one swallow to make a summer," but there are many such swallows flitting through the air and building their nests under the eaves of our churches, and they prophesy that the winter of our sectarian strife is passing, and that the summer of Christian fraternity and co-operation is at hand.

Referring to the above statement of Brother Hill concerning the kind and courteous treatment he is receiving from his religious neighbors, it reminds us of a story told us in boyhood, the moral of which we have never forgotten. A Quaker entertaining a man who was moving from one state to another, was told by the emigrant that he had very bad neighbors where he came from who were ill-natured and unaccommodating. Said the old Quaker, in reply: "Thou wilt have bad neighbors in the new state where thou art going." A few days later he entertained another emigrant moving to a new state, who boasted of the good neighbors he had left behind, and expressed his sorrow in parting from them. "Well," said the Quaker host, "thou wilt find good neighbors where thou art going." The old Quaker had a simple philosophy which he acted upon, that kindness begets kindness, and that unkindness, likewise, begets unkindness. Is it not altogether probable that in this bit of Quaker wisdom, borrowed from Christ, we have the explanation of why it is that in some communities our churches are treated very courteously, and in others they claim to be misrepresented and persecuted? The suggestion is at least worth looking into.

Editor's Easy Chair.

The Easy Chair to-day rocks in its northern home beside the resounding Lake, whose tumultuous waves fill our ears with their ceaseless monotones. The wind is blowing a steady gale from the northwest and has filled the Lake with noisy billows which, like white maned steeds, chase each other shoreward in endless succession. The sky is clear, save a few white clouds which float high in the air like phantom ships in the upper deep. The sun shines through these vapor clouds and paints the surface of the Lake with nearly all the tints of the rainbow. And this is the scene that spreads itself out before us this afternoon, as we rest under the shade of the trees on the heights of "Garrison Park." Thank God for the trees! How gracefully they bend in the breeze that comes over the Lake, and how grateful are the shadows they cast for protection from the heat of the sun! How soothing is the rustle of their leaves, as if they were whispering to each other the secrets of their life and joy! For the time being the Easy Chair is converted into a hammock, and what is more restful than a hammock swung under the trees where one can gaze upward through their branches into the infinite blue? How easy it is, at such a time, when the imagination is kindled by the immensities which are stretched out above one, to believe in the infinities and the eternities! No creed of narrow negations measured up to the sublime realities which lie open to the gaze. At such a time, and under such circumstances, Nature, in her vastness, becomes a magnificent symphony in which roaring waves, sighing trees, and singing spheres, are but the different parts.

> "Great and marvelous are Thy works, O Lord
> Almighty,
> In wisdom hast Thou made them all."

"The Pioneer" has been almost the only inhabited cottage on the Lake shore since our arrival, though in a few days we expect our neighbors to the immediate north of us, of the Oceana Beach Company, to be in their cottages, and the club house, we believe, is being opened to-day and put in order for the entertainment of guests. As the name "Pioneer" suggests, we are the first to occupy a cottage in this park. Pioneer life has its attractions, but it has its drawbacks, also. The chief deprivation we feel here is the absence of a few familiar friends, whose faces we have been wont to see in these summer outings. No doubt, some of these will come later and, meanwhile, our companions must be the lakes and the trees and the birds and the squirrels. The birds, however, are not numerous, for they like human companionship, and there are not enough people here yet to attract them in large numbers. Speaking of pioneering reminds us that a good brother wrote us recently that he thought we were doing too much "pioneering" in the way of introducing new and disturbing ideas among the brethren. "Art thou he that disturbest Israel?" The prophet thus interrogated pleaded "not guilty," and laid the responsibility for the disturbance elsewhere. We certainly hope that we have not been a disturber of Israel in any evil sense. God knows we have no motive for disturbing the brethren except for their good. Many years ago, we came to the conclusion that we could serve God and our fellowmen best by declaring his truth, as he gave us to see the truth. We have sought to do this with proper humility and respect for the judgment of others, and in the spirit of love. Of course, we may have erred both in our thinking and in our manner of expressing our thought, but in either case the error was unintentional and we certainly regret it. What we desire, above all things else, is to know the truth of God as it relates to human duty and destiny, and to speak that truth in love. If this course makes us enemies, that is one of the crosses we must bear for the sake of truth, and especially for his sake who was truth incarnate.

The quietest Fourth of July we have known for many years, we experienced yesterday in "Garrison Park." As sole occupants of the resort, we felt it incumbent upon us that the day which celebrates our nation's birth should have some recognition at our hands. So we laid in a few firecrackers, skyrockets, Roman candles, and the stars and stripes, and after a quiet restful day, when the great red, round sun had sunk, like a ball of fire, in the west, and quenched its flame in the Lake, and night's candles were lighted in the blue dome above, we marched down to the beach, built a bonfire, planted our flag on the ramparts of a sand dune and sang patriotic airs. Then the junior member of our party, who in the evening had dressed herself as the Goddess of Liberty, sent up her skyrockets over the lake and felt that she had had a part in celebrating the Glorious Fourth. Over the live coals of the bonfire, we roasted a few marshmallows, and then the patriarch of the party was asked to relate some old war stories out of his experience as a soldier. All this accomplished, we covered our coals with the sand and retired to the cottage, feeling that we had appropriately expressed our approval of the Declaration of Independenece and the birth of the American Republic. This recalls the Fourth of July of the olden times. There was a barbecue in the woods. The neighbors far and near came to celebrate the day and the dinner. There was a procession formed, and some old veteran of the Mexican war marched at the front playing a fife, and some younger man beat the drum, and so we marched to the barbecue. There was a platform erected in the woods and Old Glory was flung to the breeze. The village choir rendered a few patriotic airs and the school-master read the Declaration of Independence, following which some aspiring young orator turned loose the American eagle and let her scream and flap her wings to her heart's content! Then the parson pronounced the benediction and we all retired to the dinner and ate the American beef as only hungry patriots could eat it, before the days of packing-house scandals This was the Fourth of July in ye olden times.

Speaking of the Fourth, the American people never had greater reasons for celebrating the day than at the present time. The prosecutions of trusts and monopolies and grafters throughout the country, furnish abundant reason for the belief that the American conscience is being stirred as never before. There is really reason to hope that public business and private corporations may be carried on in this "land of the free and the home of the brave" as honestly and decently as in the "effete monarchies" of the old world. We can not be too grateful for a Chief Executive that is leading forward in this work of redeeming the country from the bondage of public plunder and private graft. If the Stars and Stripes does not mean a government that can punish its evil doers, and enact and enforce wholesome laws, protecting the people from the ravages of greed, it ought to be lowered to half mast, at least, until we learn how to be honest and law-abiding, though rich and powerful. All honor to the President of the United States, to the governors of several of the states, to mayors and presecuting attorneys, and other public officials, here and there over the country, who have undertaken this gigantic task of regenerating the business methods of the United States and of teaching corporations that they are creatures of law and must be subject to law or forfeit their chartered rights and privileges. Instead of rejoicing at this exposure of crime there are people appalled by it and discouraged, just as in religious matters some good people deprecate a discussion that brings to the surface a condition of things that requires immediate remedy. Whatever helps us politically or religiously to a knowledge of evils that need to be cured, we should count as a special favor of God.

"After the storm the calm." This is the morning of a new day. The conflict between the wind and the Lake which raged all day yesterday, began to subside at sundown, when the wind showed a disposition to retire for the night. The Lake kept up its noise later but its troubles passed away with the night and this morning it smiles as placidly as an infant in its sleep. Far out toward the sky-line a steamer is passing north, carrying, no doubt, its cargo of passengers to the resorts farther north, while another headed in the opposite direction is going after others who are anxious to escape the heat of the cities. Nearer shore the little red boat of the fishermen, who have been out to their nets in the Lake opposite "Garrison Park," is making its way back with the result of the night's catch. A few days ago they showed us some ten and twelve pound trout they had caught with baited hooks on a trot-line just out in the lake in front of our cottage. This is a hint we shall act on. The reader may be prepared for fish stories! While rowing across Lake Pentwater last evening for the mail, we saw two men in a row boat just landing with four large pickerel and a basket full of smaller fish. Encouraged by this success, we put on an artificial minnow and trolled on our return trip and captured a sixteen inch pickerel, the odor of which now comes to us from the frying pan. We have had no trouble so far in supplying our table with fresh fish, although we have devoted little time to angling. With the perch and trout of Lake Michigan, the pickerel, croppie and small mouth black bass of Lake Pentwater, and the large mouthed bass of Bass Lake, four miles up, the lover of the fine art of angling will find here plenty to amuse him, and this is a prime requisite of an ideal summer resort.

Our Plea Among Scandinavians

By C. S. Osterhus

During the past fifteen or twenty years thousands of our Scandinavian people of America have been converted to God. In hundreds of places this has meant a separation from the dead and formal churches, to which many of our people before belonged. A family here, and two there, and probably ten or twenty families at the third and other places, have thus found themselves placed alone, as it were, in a cold and formal world, and in the immediate shadow of heartless and sometimes raging sectism. Besides these very discouraging influences surrounding them from the outside, they have had some bitter experiences from ravaging wolves from the inside. These thousands of families have found themselves in danger and peril from both without and within, between two fires.

How did these people get converted and get into this situation?

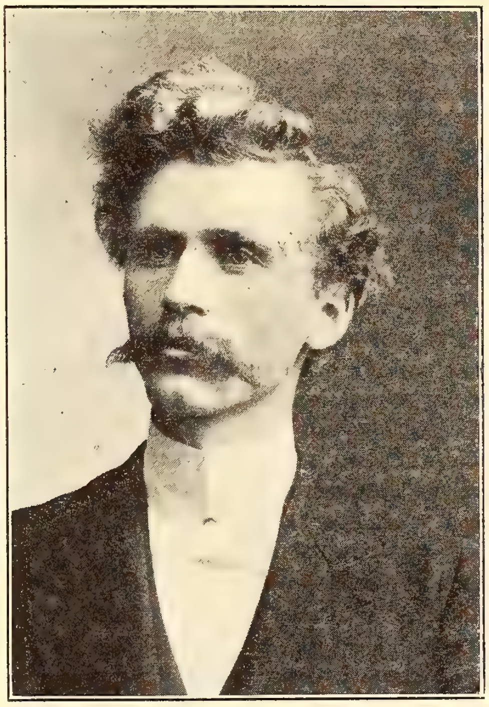
By the manifold and wonderful movings of the spirit of God among them, like as among so many other peoples in the last century. Many of our people are earnest believers before they immigrate into this country. Although the Lutheran Church is the state and predominating church of the three Scandinavian countries of Continental Europe, yet even within its walls there are thousands of believers to be found who are most devout and pious worshipers of the true God, worshiping him up to the measure of the light and knowledge they have had access to. Besides these, there are also thousands upon thousands of true disciples of Jesus of Nazareth, the true and only Christ, outside of the above-named church in these countries. In Norway, Sweden and Denmark there are a very large number of people who are truly converted to God, who worship him in spirit and also in truth, as far as they have knowledge of it.

Coming to this country, they are scattered in the various settlements of Scandinavian people, which are to be found mostly in the states of Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska and Kansas. Quite a few are along the states of the Atlantic coast; and in later years quite a few are to be found in the states of the Pacific coast, as also in Canada and Texas.

There are to-day at least about four millions of these good citizens in America. There are at least 7,000 organized churches or congregations among them, the greatest part of which are Lutherans. Some are Methodists, some Baptists, some Congregationalists, etc. There are at least 3,500 ministers working among them. They have many great synods, schools, colleges, seminaries and institutions of benevolence, etc.

But aside from all these things, there now exists among them a large company of believers, who would like to be Christians only, and who, for years, have searched to find the good old paths of the apostolic, primitive and real New Testament church. Some of them have read themselves out of denominationalism, and some have prayed themselves out of it; and many have been converted out of it, so to speak.

As aforesaid, many of our people were disciples of Christ before they came to this country. Some of them joined some denomination for a time (mostly Lutheran), others not; and whether they did or not, many of these have read and prayed themselves out of the questionable creeds of men. With the open Bible before them, many of them have set out to preach the Gospel, as best they could in their home district, and adjoining districts. Some have for years gone out to spend their entire time preaching in larger districts. This has been going on for many years, probably fifteen or twenty years, anyhow; in a larger degree especially during the last eight or ten years.



C. S. Osterhus.

The result of it is that there is today (speaking especially for the Norwegians and Danes) at least 200 scattered groups of Disciples of Christ throughout the various states named above, who would like to be Christians only, and who stand independent of human creeds, etc. Some of them are only small groups of a few families, others larger ones from ten, fifteen and twenty families or more in each place. Some of them, especially the larger ones, are partially organized, and have nice church buildings, etc. Others are not organized at all. They simply come together and sing and pray and read the Scriptures, etc., as best they can, without any leader or local preacher. Some of them can testify well and give a Gospel exhortation. But few of them can preach or teach. Hence the large majority of these many groups are almost literally "as sheep without a shepherd."

There are probably 100 or maybe 150 evangelistic preachers among these groups. Nearly all of them are so-called self-made evangelists, who have had no college or Bible school training. Yet some are very good preachers. But the greatest difficulty is that not all of them "speak the same thing," some causing considerable confusion. And nearly all of them teach erroneously as to the servants of the church which the Scriptures designate as "pastors and teachers." The result is there is no capable minister of Christ to care for the flock at each place; hence the flock is open to most any kind of influence from the straying preachers.

One great cause of this is the fact that there is no organic co-operation and systematic work done. Every evangelist teaches what he pleases, and goes where he pleases; some groups are visited often by sometimes two or three evangelists at a time, who happen to meet at one place, not knowing about each other. Other places are entirely neglected, not having preaching for six months. There is no Bible school yet among them where those going out to preach could learn to know the same truths, and work in harmony one with another. The great and good cause is therefore suffering greatly. The papers circulated among them teach the same errors as most of the evangelists on the subject named. What they despisingly call a paid ministry is strenuously opposed. They have seen the extreme on one side, so they go to the extreme on the other side.

This was the situation as I found it when, six years ago, I found myself standing isolated from everybody, as it seemed.

In order that the reader may see how the New Testament plea works its way even to the hearts of Lutheran ministers, I will give you

A Brief Sketch of My Life and Work.

I was born 34 years ago at this place, Ossian, Iowa, where I now live temporarily. My parents were both born in Norway. I understand the Dano-Norwegian language very well—a good deal better than I do English. My parents were Lutherans and I was faithfully taught the doctrines of that church from childhood. My father was an earnest preacher among the laity, so-called. I was trained at our splendid Norwegian seminary at Minneapolis, Minn. Yet I preached the Gospel for several years before I took the Bible course at the seminary. I began preaching publicly and regularly as assistant pastor of eight churches in Iowa, which my brother-in-law had charge of when I was 19 years of age, now fifteen years ago. Thus, I am not so very young in the Gospel work, although somewhat young in years. I was duly and regularly ordained to the Gospel ministry in 1897, and served churches in Iowa, Oregon and Washington as regular pastor in charge. I later traveled some as evangelist in Minnesota and North Dakota. God graciously blessed the ministry. Souls were saved and believers greatly strengthened and edified in Christ. (This latter, that of teaching and shepherding the believer, being, perhaps, my strongest side, the special gift of God.) I had two beautiful churches in Oregon. We had a nice home and were greatly loved by the people.

But now came severe trials of a new character to me. I had been severely tested in life before, even in a very young age, but not in this way. It was six years ago. By an incessant and deep study of the Bible, under increasing prayers and unbroken earnestness to know the truth and the truth only, God led me to see some of the errors of the doctrines of the Lutheran Church. My conscience, my Bible and my God bade me testify in word and deed against errors and sins. It was daring for me, a young man, a lonely preacher in one of the extreme western cities, to take a different view of these eternal matters than the whole powerful army of 70,000,000 of Lutherans in the world, with its thousands upon thousands of highly educated, well trained and skilled ministers, teachers and professors, colleges and seminaries. But almost unconsciously, in a way, I was brought face to face with a similar state of affairs, as our dear young Luther was when he said those never to be forgotten words:

> "Here I stand; I can not do otherwise. God help me! Amen."

With my open Bible in hand, I could not revoke the truths it had revealed to me. The interpretations of men, councils and synods could not change my convictions.

Oh, those wonderful days and hours! It causes my tears to flow even now at this writing to think back upon those days of dreadful revolutions in my life six years ago. In my intense agony on the point of baptism, for instance, I could hardly help praying: "Oh, God, send some angel of heaven and once for all settle this question among men." But no angel came. But the Advocate with the Father and with men, the Spirit of Truth and the true Bible Commentator, the gentle, faithful Revealer of Truth as it is in Christ Jesus, the Holy Spirit, "took of Christ's (and God's word) and declared them unto me" (John 16:13,14). The New Testament plea was made plain to me, more than ever before.

So, after having passed through the agonies of our brother, young Martin Luther, and after many prayers, much searching and many tears, I took my stand, by the grace of God, with him who loved me so he died for me.

My wife and I were baptized by immersion. The act itself meant the nailing of at least one great thesis upon the spacious door of the Lutheran Church. And this again meant the loss of home, friends and support for me and my family. But with Luther we sang:

"A mighty fortress is our God,
  A bulwark never failing;
Our helper he amid the flood
  Of mortal ills prevailing.
Let goods and kindred go,
This mortal life also;
The body they may kill;
God's truth abideth still,
  His kingdom is forever."

Yes, we continued, by the grace of God and his courage, to sing even these words:

"And tho' this world with devils filled
  Should threaten to undo us,
We will not fear, for God hath willed
  His truth to triumph through us."

And dear old brother Paul Gerhardt helped us to word the next verse of our song:

"Commit thou all thy ways,
  And all thy grief and care,
To him whom heaven obeys,
  Whose love is everywhere.
For air, and clouds, and wind,
  He findeth pathways meet;
Shall he not also find
  The pathway for thy feet?"

I had just previously quietly resigned from my two churches in Oregon, as the heavy strain of work, and study and anxiety, now and before, had ruined my health. But I had not formally resigned from the church body in general. They let my name remain on the clergy list for about two years, when they quietly took it off. Hence the church really withdrew from me, when I lived up to the Bible faith. Financial support had, of course, been withdrawn long before. Nearly all the earnest Christians resigned from the local church in Oregon when we did. They stood by us faithfully. They wept bitterly when we left. The home, or parsonage, belonged to the church, so we had to leave everything, of course. We have been a homeless family ever since, living most of these six years "on grace" in the crowded homes of others. You see, my health was broken, and my income gone immediately. We stood alone, had no church any more and lost many friends on account of our baptism. It has been some very, yes, truly, very hard years. But I can not take space to relate any of that here. Suffice it to say God has wonderfully stood by us and borne us up.

"And none can stay his arm,
  Nor bid his work be still,
When he will save from harm
  His people Israel."

A wonderful and peculiar training it has been. Many a lesson of humility and patience has been taught us.

Although for a time thrown out of active pastoral work on account of this change in church matters and broken health, yet I was laboring day and night during all these hard years, searching for a way out. I carried on an extensive searching by correspondence in two languages, and by occasional journeys here and there attending special meetings and conventions, for weeks and sometimes months studying the various movements, as well as the religious situation and condition in America in general the last two years or more, especially among our own Scandinavian people.

This finally led me, by the wonderful leadings of God, to begin writing a series of articles for two of our large Norwegian weeklies of Chicago about two years ago. These papers are especially circulated among the 30,000 to 50,000 independently standing Disciples of Christ, referred to in the first part of this article. They were upon themes like "The True Church of God and His Christ," its "Officers," such as "Pastors and Teachers," and a great deal on "Unity of All Believers in Christ," etc., etc.

Hundreds of letters of appreciation soon came flooding in to me from all directions of the country. A great many were from preachers. All expressed a deep longing for the true unity of all believers among us, having longed deeply for it in their hearts for years, but none of them had been given the courage or commission to speak the word and dare to be a spokesman for the sacred cause in general. The peculiar training I had had in God's school made it a matter of conscience for me to speak. God had enabled me, by his grace, to take a bold step six years ago against sectism and human creeddom. He seemed much pleased to enable me to take another one now. And again I had to obey the constraint of the love of God for the truth. So, in December, 1904, he encouraged me to call the first general unity convention or conference among our Norwegian and Danish Christians.

Although I was personally unacquainted with the majority of the readers of the papers I was permitted to have the loaned use of, yet they had listened intently to the sound of the trumpet which I had, like Gideon of old, blown. And they came together from more than five tribes of the religious dispersion among our people. At the earnest invitation of the Church of Christ at Chippewa Falls, Wis. (Julius Stone, pastor), the convention assembled there. And that never-to-be-forgotten conference was held there for seven whole days, in January, 1905, with almost all day and all night sessions every day of the seven.

I had most carefully prepared the program ahead and published it in the papers several weeks previous. The keynote of it was Christ's unity prayer in John 17:20-23. A wonderful spirit of God's love was prevalent throughout the whole conference. There were delegates present from all over this land and a noted evangelist from Denmark also. It set an indelible mark upon every one present.

Among other things done was that a committee of five was elected to arrange for another convention in June, 1905. Brother Stone, your humble writer and three others constituted the committee. Your humble writer was further elected to travel continually in the cause of unity among our scattered groups of Christians throughout our land and interest them all sincerely in the unity prayer of Jesus in John 17:20-23; hence to co-operate together in Christian work for lost mankind.

By the grace of God we carried it through with great success and much blessing.

I traveled continually up to the convention, and visited scores upon scores of real and genuine churches of Christ among our people throughout all these states. I traveled in three months over 6,000 miles in Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, South Dakota, Nebraska and Kansas, and preached on an average more than once every day, besides the long distances traveled. Sometimes I held four long meetings inside of twenty-six hours, from Saturday night till Sunday night; and I seldom spoke less than one and a half hours to the hungry assembly in each meeting, besides the writing of hundreds of letters during these months (more than 1,000 for the year), and almost regular weekly articles for the two papers.

God was wonderfully with us in great power and blessing. Truly, he was.

The program for the second general unity convention, held at Hutchinson, Minn., last June, was carefully prepared by your humble brother, assisted by the other members of the committee, Brother Stone not the least. Delegates came again from all over these states, yes, even from the state of Washington; and greetings in the work have come to me by hundreds upon hundreds of letters from all over this land. For seven days the program was again carefully discussed with great educational value to our scattered Christians. Your humble brother was unanimously re-elected to travel continually in the cause of unity among our whole people.

After that immense work I had undertaken for months previous, and after acting as chairman of the conference for seven hot June days, my strength was pretty well worn down. For months I had not had more than about five or six hours good rest per night, besides the almost phenomenal amount of work done in traveling, meetings day and night, several times a day and all day, hundreds of letters to write in spare moments while riding on trains, etc., etc. I needed a few days rest. Arriving home June 8, I broke completely down with what had every appearance of tuberculosis of the lungs and my life doomed to death. I quickly wrote a request for prayer to our two papers, which yet stood by us. Thousands of prayers went up for me from those who had learned to love me everywhere in this work. Scores and scores wrote me letters of sympathy and love.

God heard the earnest prayers from our hearts. My lungs were soon perfectly well, and have been ever since. Glory be to God in the highest, ever and ever!

I am, therefore, among you, dear brethren, as a man redeemed from the grave almost literally. My life is truly a gift of God in a double sense to me.

But by this time the devil began to dislike this unity movement, seeing his craft of sectarianism was in danger of coming in disrepute at least. The Gospel of Christ had been preached with power and divine force, and without fear. The spirit of the devil, called sectism, felt pinched and made a howl. The howl scared the papers we had the loaned use of. So now we have not for many months had any paper that will faithfully serve this sacred cause among our divided people.

I am praying day and night for God to supply us means to publish a real Church of Christ paper that will stand for all that Christ and his Gospel stands for. My own personal correspondence makes it a necessity. People write me from all over this land, asking me to explain to them this Scripture and that Scripture. People are hungry for light and teaching. But few are the capable teachers among them. For most of these thousands of Christians have, like myself, come out from the Lutheran Church; and they are most literally as sheep without a shepherd.

How it does pain me to read these hundreds of letters and hear these hundreds of Macedonian cries, "Come over and help us!" especially painful since I am utterly unable with my own pen or person to help them all as fully as I ought to.

One of the main causes for this has been the lack of money to carry on the work successfully and continually. Remember, that for more than six whole years I have received no salary or regular income from any source whatever. I labor hard with my hands for a support for the family, wife and six little children (with additional help and an aged mother, in all always ten, often twelve, at our table), laboring up to fifteen and eighteen hours daily. I labor all day for a support, even up to 9 p. m., then try to do all the spiritual work I can after 9 o'clock at night. I sit up and write till 12, 1, 2 and even 3 o'clock at night very often; in fact, most of the time till about midnight, writing, searching the Scriptures and praying.

This is when I am at home, which I have been compelled to be now for many months for lack of funds. You see, the scattered and mostly unorganized condition of these independent and divided groups make the financial arrangements as poor as their own religious situation. Besides, most of the unstable evangelists and papers working among them have for years taught error on finances in the kingdom of God. They are yet opposed to a steady and systematic way of giving. Hence a little collection here and there will not carry a steady and systematic and persistent work of this kind yet. My prayer has, therefore, for a long time been for several definite things relative to this work, two of which are these, namely:

1. That God would some way send me needed support so I could be free to spend my entire time as a special unity messenger among our people, with tongue and pen to assist in the formation of and the setting in proper and Biblical order real churches of God and his Christ among these hundreds of scattered groups of Christians, who are either wholly unorganized or at least only partially so.

2. That God would some way soon send me means for the publishing of a real Church of Christ paper in the Dano-Norwegian language for teaching of the full and pure Gospel of Christ and his kingdom, presenting the beautiful New Testament plea, without partiality or sectism. We have no such paper in all America in our language! And we have a Scandinavian population of 4,000,000 in America alone to work among with such a paper.

We must have such a paper, and that soon if we shall be able to reap while the harvest is ripe, and before it is blown down by the devouring winds of error.

I humbly lay these desires before the throne of mercy and before the people

Modern Religious Persecution

By B. L. Chase

1. Its Instruments.

It has become very popular in modern times to denounce persecution, and to say unkind things of persecutors. I fear it is because we misunderstand the persecutor. Sometime the history of persecution will be written from the standpoint of the persecutor instead of the persecuted; then the world will see it very differently. Up to the present time we have been made to see it in the light of the pains suffered by the guilty, rather than in the crimes committed by the guilty. Punishment for crime is one thing to the criminal, another thing to the judge. The readers of history have always viewed persecution from the side of the criminal. It is not just to the glorious company of persecutors who have saved the truth in the hour of its peril. To them we owe the heritage of faith and truth which is ours to-day.

Let no one suppose the persecutor takes pleasure in his gruesome work any more than the hangman. It is a painful duty which he owes to his brethren, to his conscience and his God. It falls to him because to him belong the stronger conviction and the greater courage. Men are found congratulating themselves that they do not live in the age of the inquisition and the auto-da-fe; that heretics are no longer burned in civilized countries; and that there can be difference of religious opinion without banishment or confiscation of goods. Many of these men will be found to glory in their religious fancies and conceits, and to riot in their liberty. What a brood of fads and fancies in religion, of isms and ologies, have sprung up in the wake of modern religious liberty. A man can believe anything he pleases to-day, and no one can molest him. The result is that we have hundreds of denominations or sects teaching doctrines of every shade of color. It was not so in the days when persecutors could require every man to believe as every other man, on pain of death. We have gained liberty in modern times, but we have lost unity. We shall never have the glorious unity of the primitive church and of ancient times until there arises another order of faithful defenders of the faith.

Persecution is not what it used to be. Most of the objectionable features of mediaeval persecution have been removed to-day. Its instruments and methods have been refined under the refining influence of modern civilization, and all of its old-time horror has been eliminated. One who would be shocked at the sight of the thumbscrew, the branding iron, the iron boot, the flesh pinchers and many other instruments of torture used in ancient times upon the quivering flesh of men and maidens, could not possibly object to the instruments in use to-day. If modern persecutors keep within the law, no heretic's body is touched. He is made to feel no physical pain, unless it be an indirect result of the refined process. No iron, or steel, not even wood, is sharpened and driven into the flesh. An ordinary pen and a little paper and ink is all the equipment a modern persecutor needs, as it is all the law allows. He uses only words. All that he attempts to do is to define and name the man's error, and warn the churches or the colleges.

That you may know how unobjectionable the modern instruments of torture are, I have copied the following list of choice and effective epithets used by a very distinguished persecutor among the Disciples: "Surrenderers of the plea," "Revolutionary teachings," "Disturbers of the faith," "Destructive critics," "Subverters of our plea," "Sowers of discord," "Corruptionists," "Would-be clergymen," "Antagonists of the Bible," "Anti-Scriptural," "Subtle adversaries," "Traitors to our cause," "Betrayers of our Lord," "Enemies of the Simple Gospel," "Heretics," "Agnostics," "Infidels," "Followers of Bob Ingersoll," "Hypocrites," "Masquerading Infidels," "Retailers of agnosticism," "Defenders of infidelity and hypocrisy."

There are but few cases of heresy which require the application of some of the last of the foregoing terms; they are reserved for some of the more serious cases of departure from the faith. Not many men would have the courage to deal in this way with false teachers who are received into the bosoms of the churches and given places upon convention programs, or have the courage to continue the persecution when the persons so accused went about deceiving the people with smooth words, and in spite of the warnings of true and faithful brethren, were praised in many of the large city churches as Christian gentlemen. But few men would have the skill to unmask such false teachers and show the wolf beneath the sheep's clothing. Such persecutors show themselves to be true defenders of the faith by risking their all—their reputations for honesty and veracity, their publishing companies and the missionary work and unity of their church—in their determination to expose such heretics and prevent them from getting any chance to speak their errors to their brethren. The Disciples are to be congratulated that they possess one or two such true souls in the midst of the alarming apostasies of these last days, who are ready to lay down their lives and reputations for the plea.

There are few that can be made to believe that such men as receive the foregoing epithets exist outside of the penitentiary, much less hold membership in many churches where they are given office and respect. The few who do believe it are the salt of the earth and the true lights of the present darkened generation. So dull and insensible has the present generation become that they seem no longer moved to righteous indignation against these men who are shown to be "infidels" and abettors of "agnostics." After being told that they are "Higher critics" churches will call them to deliver lectures, secretaries of missionary societies will retain them as friends and place their names on national convention programs. They seem to have forgotten what "infidel" means, and rather to court the title as a badge of honor than spurn it as a stigma of reproach.

One is almost ready to conclude that the treatment of heretics that is allowed to-day is altogether too mild; that the persecutor, as well as the public, has grown too sensitive to suffering. As soon as a heretic is exposed the people seem to rally around him to prevent his suffering from even a sense of loneliness. If one of his poisonous books is denounced as an "infidel publication," scholars continue to recommend it, and the people seem afraid that the sale of the book will suffer; so they buy and advise all their friends to buy copies of the

DOCTOR'S SHIFT

Now Gets Along Without It.

A physician says: "Until last fall I used to eat meat for my breakfast and suffered with indigestion until the meat had passed from the stomach.

"Last fall I began the use of Grape-Nuts for breakfast and very soon found I could do without meat, for my body got all the nourishment necessary from the Grape-Nuts and since then I have not had any indigestion and am feeling better and have increased in weight.

"Since finding the benefit I derived from Grape-Nuts I have prescribed the food for all of my patients suffering from indigestion or over-feeding and also for those recovering from disease where I want a food easy to take and certain to digest and which will not overtax the stomach.

"I always find the results I look for when I prescribe Grape-Nuts. For ethical reasons please omit my name." Name given by mail by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The reason for the wonderful amount of nutriment, and the easy digestion of Grape-Nuts is not hard to find.

In the first place, the starchy part of the wheat and barley goes through various processes of cooking, to perfectly change the starch into Dextrose or Post Sugar, in which state it is ready to be easily absorbed by the blood. The parts in the wheat and barley which Nature can make use of for rebuilding brain and nerve centres are retained in this remarkable food, and thus the human body is supplied with the powerful strength producers so easily noticed after one has eaten Grape-Nuts each day for a week or 10 days. "There's a reason."

Some of My Likings

By William Durban

3. The Kind of Preaching I Like.

Though I once was young, and now am growing venerable, I find that in most respects I am just as youthful as I ever was. My conviction is that Christians who are total abstainers and philosophers as to rules of ordinary life do not grow old but have found the secret of perpetual juvenility. So I am beginning to appreciate all the meaning of dear old Cicero's treatise "De Senectute," which in my early days I read with delight because of its classic beauty, and now find that I shall be myself a subject of some of the choicest pleasures of the sunset of life.

My First Love and My Last in Theology.

I was cradled and trained in Puritanism. And I am not at all ashamed to say that I am a genuine Puritan to-day. I am many other things besides, for I am a broad churchman and a high churchman in certain applications of those terms; I am a free churchman or nonconformist and an ecclesiastical radical; I am an advanced Protestant and Disciple of Christ; I am a higher critic of the moderate or conservative type and a sympathizer with such men of research as Flinders, Petrie and Professor Sayce; I am given to rejoicing in all the results of effort on the part of Christian socialists and present-day reformers who make religion an applied science. So let it not be thought that my persistent Puritanism has narrowed my outlook or cramped my sympathies. It was declared by a distinguished Frenchman, fifty years ago, Monod the elder, that poor France was dying for lack of Puritanism. Half a century earlier Napoleon uttered his famous dictum that France was dying for want of mothers. Had the great emperor understood his country and its need as well as did the great theologian he would have seen that a nation which had killed its Puritanism when it destroyed the Huguenots, must inevitably lose motherhood and much else. To slaughter the bulk of the Protestants and to expatriate the remnant of them was to ensure the decadence of the national life. A land which once has had the reformation and has rejected it must lie under a curse. Under such a curse France and Spain languish at this hour. I meet with only a few people who seem to realize, however, in all its force, the principle that the greatness, the glory, the happiness, and the prosperity of any people must depend positively on the theological type of the national faith.

How Theology Makes a Nation.

I have often wished that the point I am now emphasizing were more generally perceived by Christian people. If they understood it they might seek to impress it on politicians, statesmen, literary men and others who are for the most part utterly ignorant in this regard. Does history teach anything more clearly than this that national differentiations are shaped, happily or miserably, as the case may be, entirely by the trend of the national creed? Russia is what she is, and she fell under the withering vengeance of a pagan nation, simply through the superstitious doctrine of ikonolatry. The notion that saints could give all benedictions through the curious amulets known as ikons or picture-images of those saints, has ruined the vast nation. The type of doctrinal conviction ingrained in the very soul of the people has turned the whole course of Russian history. Let none of us imagine that it is of small consequence what a nation believes. This is the one vital consideration. Why is Scotland, a tiny country, influencing the thought and life of the whole world beyond all proportion to its size and its population? Because it with fiery enthusiasm adopted the reformation and flung off the yoke of the Pope. And why is there such indomitable grit in the Scottish character? Because of the sturdy factor incorporated in the national creed by Knox, called Calvinism. Knox had lived with Calvin for some time. Calvinism has its weak side, I well know, but so has each type of theology. We have to consider theology in its types all round. Why are the Welsh the most religious people on earth, for I feel well assured that there is nowhere so devout a community? Because of the Puritanic elements which form the backbone both of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodism in the north and of the faith of the great Welsh Baptist church which really possess the land in South Wales? Little Wales has been gallantly defying the worst efforts of Tory ecclesiasticism during the last three years until recently the Liberals came back to power. But this is because Wales is not merely Protestant, like Germany, like America, like Denmark, like England, like Scotland, but because Wales is even more Puritan in the theology of its preachers and of its churches than is any other country on earth. We have been in England witnessing the magnificent progress of a strenuous movement called the Passive Resistance Campaign. But I have noted that Puritanism was the mainspring of that movement. The free churches that care comparatively little, theologically speaking, for the Puritanism that made England great in the Cromwellian period, have taken languid interest in the struggle or have only been dragged into it by the force of example.

The Preaching That Converts.

Years ago I came to the conclusion that Puritanism is the secret of converting efficacy in preaching. There is no absolute, cast-iron Puritanism. Puritan theology has its variations. It is elastic so that it fits itself to the moulds of individual temperament, and adapts itself to the idiosyncracy of personality. The Puritan accent of Moody differed from that of Spurgeon. But Spurgeon was styled "the last of the English Puritans," and Moody certainly was in his theology an American replica of the great English preacher, as Dr. A. T. Pierson is to-day constantly suggestive of the Spurgeonic cast of theologic thought. Yet what could be more different in homiletic method than a sermon by C. H. Spurgeon and a sermon by D. L. Moody? The intense Puritanism of Talmage gave the masses of the people confidence in him as a religious teacher. The kind of evangelicalism inculcated to-day by W. L. Watkinson, by T. G. Selby, by Mark Guy Pearse, by Rattenbury of Nottingham, by Jowett of Birmingham, by Barrett of Norwich, by McLaren of Manchester, by Bishop Boyd Carpenter, by Dr. Campbell Morgan of Westminster, by Henry Varley, by Gypsy Smith and others who are true Puritans, though in many cases they may hardly be definitely conscious of the identification rarely make any claim to Puritanism. I have just been reading with extreme gratification a baccalaureate sermon preached by Dr. Hillis at the College of New York. It is full of the charm of simple eloquence. Its thoughtfulness is profound. But it is intensely evangelical and is as Puritan as if Manton or Charnock had written it. Dr. Amory Bradford recently, during my delightful visit to him at Montclair, kindly presented to me his latest published book. It is perfectly Puritan, while fully up to date in its treatment of the topics chosen. The greatest modern preachers—by which I mean those who are really reaching the people and affecting the thought of the age through the pulpit—are genuine Puritans of the permanent type of Puritanism. The reader

DIFFERENT NOW

Since the Slugger Coffee was Abandoned.

Coffee probably causes more biliousness and so-called malaria than any one other thing—even bad climate. A Ft. Worth man says:

"I have always been of a bilious temperament, subject to malaria and up to one year ago a perfect slave to coffee and at times I would be covered with boils and full of malarial poison, was very nervous and had swimming in the head.

"I don't know how it happened but I finally became convinced that my sickness was due to the use of coffee and a little less than a year ago I stopped coffee and began drinking Postum. From that time I have not had a boil, not had malaria at all, have gained 15 pounds good solid weight and know beyond all doubt this is due to the use of Postum in place of coffee as I have taken no medicine at all.

"Postum has certainly made healthy red blood for me in place of the blood that coffee drinking impoverished and made unhealthy." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum makes red blood.

As Seen From the Dome

By F. D. Power

Through a constant and ever-varying panorama of village and rural Egyptian life for 150 miles, on a comfortable railroad car, one journeys to Cairo from Alexandria, and soon gets a glimpse of the famous Pyramids and enters the White City of the East, with visions of Saladin and Harun-al-Rashid and Napoleon, of Oriental romance and poetry and history crowding his already overcrowded brain. On the east bank of the Nile, twelve miles from the apex of the Delta, stands this city of 600,000 people. It is built partly on the plain and partly on the slope of the Mokattem range. It is a city of walls and towers, gardens and squares, palaces and mosques, domes and minarets, with luxurious hotels and visitors from every clime; a city of pure air and perpetual sunshine, of Fellahs and Copts, of Turks and Jews, of Negroes and Bedouins, English and French and Germans and Americans. It was once a fortress called Babylon. Some say the Persians under Cambyses, who conquered Egypt in 525 A. D., founded it as "New Babylon"—but it existed before Cambyses and before Rameses II. It is pre-historic. Anir invaded Egypt 638 and on the site of Babylon pitched his tent and named his town Fostal. Then came the Khaliff Muizz 869, and named the place Masr-el-Kahira, and so we have Cairo, but the natives still say "Masr."

The city is called a precious diamond in the handle of the green fan of the Delta, and praised for the power of its princes, the beauty of its women, the charm of its climate, in all the Oriental imagery and extravagance of The Thousand and One Nights. "He who has not seen Cairo has not seen the world. Its earth is gold, its women are bewitching, and its Nile is a wonder." "As compared wtih a sight of Cairo what is the joy of setting eyes on your beloved!" We saw it from the citadel under the glowing Egyptian sun, and again on a fine evening, coming down the Nile from Memphis, as the sun went down behind the Pyramids, gleaming through the palm groves with cupolas and minarets glittering in airy robes of rose and violet; and again under the soft light of the stars; and it is beautiful.

What a mixture of people! My first stroll was along the Muski, without knowing where I was. Here was a continuous stream of riders, carriages, camels, donkeys, and foot passengers, with rustle and tramp and clatter and voices in a score of tongues and picturesque costumes of every race and tribe and people, tarboush and turban and hat, veiled women with their hideous nose pieces, Arab lancers, Soudanese infantry and Egyptian cavalry, vendors of all sorts of goods, great bazaars with thousands of dollars represented in oil of roses, perfumes and spices, glass and china, cloth and silks, jewelry and brasses, rugs and carpets, gold and silver and copper wares, and noisy costermongers crying their stuff on every hand. Here is a scribe with his ink horn and reed pen; Bedouins from the desert with striped "Kufieh" and bare legs; Pashas in state, with runners going before him to prepare the way; a camel train laden with Oriental goods, passing in the midst of automobiles and bicycles; a turkey vendor driving his birds along the crowded thoroughfare with a palm branch; a little donkey wagon loaded with veiled women, and the driver feeding clover to his beast as he walks along; a milkman driving his goats, and milking them for you while you wait; sometimes the goat going up stairs to the second story and supplying the customer; a wedding procession preceded by dancing girls, or a funeral with black-shawled professional mourners, yelling their mercenary grief as they go—such are some sights one sees in Cairo.

Some of the mosques here are interesting. There is Sultan Hassan with the inscription, "This building is dedicated to Allah the Merciful, the Compassionate," with its quaint sublimity, its beautiful dome, 180 feet, its five windows and arches, its impressive religious atmosphere, and its minaret, 290 feet. There is El Azhar, the university founded in 975, perhaps the oldest of universities, with its 6,000 students and 225 teachers, from Algeria, Morocco, Nubia and elsewhere, all sitting and repeating in monotonous voices passages from the Koran, an exercise of memory with little original work or training in grammar, literature, philosophy or science. The great school is endowed, teachers get only their food, and many of the students are charity scholars. There is "the Alabaster Mosque, or Muhammad Ali, in the center of the citadel, built in imitation of St. Sophia, with beautiful columns and wall facings of alabaster, the most distinctive feature of Cairo. To see one mosque is to see all. They are built in uniform style. The plan is an oblong rectangle, in the center a vast court yard, in the middle of which is a fountain of ablutions. This court is enclosed by a colonnade which forms the Liwan, or place of prayer. The sanctuary is in the southeastern part of the Liwan looking toward Mecca. The most sacred part of the building, like the choir of a Catholic cathedral, is screened off from the rest, and contains the tomb of the founder. There is a richly sculptured and decorated niche of prayer, the "Kiblah," and on the right the "Mimbar," or preaching pulpit, of marquetry and richly carved. The reading desk of the Koran, "the Kursi," and chandeliers and lamps are often very rich and artistic. The floors are covered with the costliest rugs and we must wear slippers or remove our shoes, or slip off our rubbers; and they watch jealousy to prevent defilement. Doorways are richly decorated and carved and doors studded with fretted and engraved bronze plates. Minarets have a great variety of design and at about two-thirds of the height is a balcony from which the Mueddin calls to prayer. Minarets and domes are capped with great copper crescents. Almost every mosque has its "Sebil," or fountain, where water is offered to the passer by, and there is generally a school where children study the Koran. The tombs are many of them most elaborate. For the plainer people through the headpiece is a little hole, by which they say Israfel, the angel of the resurrection, enters and catches the occupant by the hair and brings him forth. So one sees the children of the lower classes with the head shaved, excepting a little tuft in the middle, an incipient pigtail or inverted tonsure, due to this superstition.

The Egyptian museum is one of the great institutions of the city. It is a monument to two men, Marietta and Maspero. Its contents are priceless. Here are statues and mummies of Pharaohs and kings and queens of thousands of years ago, sphinxes and gods and priests, domestic utensils, jewels, grains and fruits and mummied cats and alligators, gazelles and birds, scarabs and lotus flowers—an endless array of things gathered from old tombs buried under the sands. Here is a wooden statue of a village sheik, with round head, life-like face and in-set eyes of quartz, with rock crystal pupils; statues of scribes writing on papyrus; copper statues of kings, with in-set enamelled eyes; colossal figures of men who ruled thousands of years ago; limestone statues of Rahotep and his wife, Nofret, with pigments retaining their colors after five millenniums, and eyes of colored quartz, that stare at an American in a life-like way, as if resenting his intrusion. Madame Nofret has her arms folded, and "not a wave of trouble rolls across her peaceful breast." Here are the royal mummies, discovered in 1881 and 1898. An Arab, Ahmed, "the tomb robber," was digging among the Tombs of the Kings at Luxor, and struck a shaft. Seeing he had hit upon vast treasures which meant for him untold wealth, to conceal his discovery from his companions he shouted he had seen an evil spirit, and called to them to draw him to the surface. To give an additional color to the story he threw a dead donkey down the shaft, and so had a monopoly of the lucrative antiquities, which he disposed of to foreigners. Egyptologists learned of the find, explored, and lo, thirty-six coffins of kings and queens, Seti I, Ramses II, the great Merenptah, son and successor of Ramses II, the Pharaoh of the oppression, and many others; and we stand and look into their wrinkled faces. It is a great sight. Here also is the stele, or tablet, with inscriptions of Merenptah regarding his victories over Israel, with the words, "Israel is wasted and his seed is brought to nothing," and the stone with the decree of Canopus in three tongues, Egyptian, Greek and Demotic, which, had it not been for the famous Rosetta, would have furnished the key to the ancient Egyptian language. The decree was pronounced 238 B. C., and praises Ptolemy III. for his beneficent acts, and announces new festivals in honor of the king and queen. The jewels of the collection show the skill of Egyptian gold and silver smiths. One is simply amazed at the exquisite art of these ancient workmen. Then there is a vast wealth of papyrus writings, pottery, figures of animals, lamps and other treasures. There are many other things in Cairo of great interest to the visitor. The tombs of the sultans and khaliffs; the Island of Rhoda, which, according to tradition, was the place where Moses was found among the bulrushes of the Nile; the old Nilometer, dating from 716 A. D., with its octagonal columns in the center with Arabic measurements, which tells of the rise and fall of the glorious stream from 7 ells, or 12 feet, to 15 ells, or about 25 feet, an event celebrated with great popular rejoicing. The old Coptic church, where, according to tradition, Joseph and Mary and the boy Jesus rested when in Egypt, while given over hopelessly to dirt, is worth seeing. The Coptic church is the survival of the church founded by Mark 37 A. D., and next to the Mohammedan is the strongest in Egypt. It is believed the reference in 1 Pet. 5:13 is not the Babylon in Chaldea, but the Babylon in Egypt on the east side of the Nile. Peter here sends greetings to his old friend and amanuensis. The church became degenerate and there is little to show any connection with the apostles. Over a quarter of a million Copts, they say, have gone over to Islam. There are twenty-three of the churches of this faith in Cairo. Dean Stanley said "the Coptic race is the only living representative of the most venerable nation of antiquity." By apostasy and intermarriage with Moslems they are constantly decreasing. The Greek Church is strong in Egypt, about 50,000 Greek Christians being found among the traders and merchants. Roman Catholics have aggressive missions here, and there are Armenians represented, and the church missionary society. Who does not know of the work here of Miss Whately, daughter of the archbishop of Dublin? About 1860 she began her school work in Cairo for Mohammedan boys and girls, and its story for thirty years is one of the fascinating chapters of missionary history. The United Presbyterian Church, however, is doing the best work in this old country. We attended their Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor and church services. There were 223 at Sunday-school and the offering was $320. I caught one word, "Amen," and a baby cried in English. They have in Egypt 63 congregations, 75 native workers, a membership of 7,757, an attendance of 15,935, and contribute $28,256; average attendance at Sunday-schools 11,212. The work was begun in 1854.

What the Brethren Are Saying and Doing

By B. B. TYLER.

A most important meeting, and a meeting of unusual size and interest, was held in the Central Christian Church June 20. Representatives were present from seven congregations of Disciples in Denver and vicinity. The purpose of this meeting was to consider a plan of union for mutual help and aggressive work. The Kansas City plan, after a full and free discussion, was adopted unanimously and with enthusiasm. The seven congregations that will be represented in this "joint board" are the Central, the Highlands, the South Broadway, the Berkeley, the East Side, the Elyria and the Golden Christian churches. Each of these has a pastor and the pastors seem to be "settled." I make the statement in this form because no person knows what a day or an hour may bring forth. Four of the pastors own their homes. The Berkeley church owns its parsonage. The new pastor of the East Side congregation, J. B. Haston, will, I am informed, probably buy a home in Denver. The churches named own their houses of worship except Elyria and the East Side. The Golden church owned a house of worship which it sold and is now engaged in the work of building a better house and in a more eligible section of the town. The East Side is beginning to move in the direction of a home of its own. The present condition of our churches in this part of the world is good and the outlook is radiant.

The meeting mentioned above considered also the propriety and practicability of a simultaneous evangelistic campaign. The brethren resolved to conduct such a campaign to begin in the early part of January, 1907.

The brethren are saying and doing many interesting and good things in all sections of the country. One of the best of which I have heard is the fact that W. T. Moore has set about to work in earnest to write a comprehensive history of the Disciples of Christ. It is passing strange that no history of the Disciples has been written, and yet they are preparing to celebrate, in a fitting manner, the centennial of their beginning. Almost a hundred years old and no history in print. This is probably because they have been so busy making history that no time has been left for writing. There are sermons, leaflets, tracts, booklets, innumerable, telling who the Disciples are, when, where, under what circumstances, and for what purpose, they began. Again and again "Our Plea" has been set forth. Note has been made of their rapid numerical increase in the home land and of their work—educational, medical and evangelistic—in lands beyond the seas; but no comprehensive history has been written. This is a remarkable fact. The Cumberland Presbyterians had time, inclination and ability to write at least two histories of their church some years ago. W. T. Moore is the man to tell the story of the Disciples of Christ in a comprehensive way and free from prejudice and bias for or against any school, or class, or person. His work will be, unless I am mistaken, judicially fair to all parties.

There is in "The Standard" (Baptist), of Chicago, under date of June 30, a notice of Dr. Moore's little book, entitled, "The Plea of the Disciples of Christ," recently from the press of the Christian Century Company, Chicago. The writer calls attention to the fact that Dr. Moore speaks of "The True Conception of the Bible," entertained by the Disciples, "The True Conception of God," "The True Conception of Christ," "The True Conception of the Holy Spirit," etc., and remarks that "Some of these true conceptions seem to us the common property of the Protestant world, and in no way peculiar to the Disciples; and others seem too indefinite and hazy to be called 'Conceptions' at all. But the failure of definition is not the fault of the author; it belongs to the protest of the Disciples against creeds. Dr. Moore brings not a little ability to the task of setting forth the plea of the Disciples and writes in a kindly spirit."

The remark about "The protest of the Disciples against creeds" has a strange sound coming from a Baptist. Dr. Thomas Armitage, in his "History of the Baptists," mentions among other things in the very beginning of his work, that Baptists have no creed as have Presbyterians, Methodists, Lutherans, Episcopalians, et cetera—that the only book of authority with Baptists is the Bible, especially the New Testament. His statement, as I remember it, as to the position of the Baptists on the creed question would satisfy the average Disciple. Now "the failure" of Dr. Moore in the matter "of definition" "belongs to the protest of the Disciples against creeds." How about the Baptists?

The same issue of "The Standard" notes the withdrawal of Professor Nathaniel Schmidt, of Cornell University, from the Baptist denomination, Professor Schmidt's pastor, Robert T. Jones, of the First Baptist church, Ithaca, New York, makes a statement of the case. He says that Professor Schmidt hesitated to leave the denomination because "he had never been requested, in any position he had held, or in uniting with any local church, to subscribe to a creed." "The Baptist brotherhood is not bound by a common creed," says Professor Schmidt, "nevertheless there is a general concensus of opinion as to the authority of the Bible, the person of Jesus, the way of salvation, and the manner of worship."

Is Professor Schmidt writing about Baptists or is he writing about the Disciples of Christ?

A tract has been issued by "The Pilgrim Press," Boston, entitled, "Congregational Faith and Practice," price 5 cents, which contains a hint for some scribe in "our brotherhood." The purpose of the booklet is to drill Congregationalists in the origin, history, distinctive principles and achievements of the denomination. Besides a clear statement of the fundamental principles, polity, belief and enterprises of the Congregationalists there are questions and answers for thorough drill work. Would not something of this kind be good for "our people?"

Denver, Colo.

Our Budget

—Gateways to ruin do not close through summer time.

—Nevertheless, preachers should take vacations, but elders and other helpers should keep open house at the church.

—W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, will make the principal address of the C. W. B. M. section of the Second District Convention at Sweet Springs, Mo., July 17.

—Bro. W. D. McCulley, formerly of Salisbury, Mo., has taken the important work at Cameron, Mo. This is a union of which great good may be safely predicted.

—Bro. E. W. Brickert has entered upon an active ministry with the Sullivan (Ind.) church. Brother Brickert is devoting years of exceeding usefulness to our churches.

—Bro. Claude Hill, of Mobile, Ala., in addition to taking care of that rapidly growing church and doing a work of which our whole brotherhood is proud, has recently organized a church at Citronelle.

—Bro. L. L. Carpenter and colleagues have prepared a very helpful Bethany assembly program for this year. The encampment continues from July 19 to August 13. Every attendant will be greatly benefited.

—Martin Gregory, of the Central, Walla Walla, Wash., writes: "I have given exceedingly careful examination to the Gloria in Excelsis, of which we bought 250 copies, and will say it is the finest hymnal I ever saw."

—Bro. A. H. Brown, of Greenwood, Ind., reports the church there greatly prospering under the ministry of Bro. George W. Winfrey. During June there were three additions to the membership by confession and baptism, and two otherwise.

—Bro. George W. Wise, of Leesville, La., spent ten days recently in Lodington, where he organized a church of forty members. He is a man well known in the northern part of the country and is a comparatively new man in the south.

—Marcellus Ely, recently at Soniat Avenue, New Orleans, has assumed charge of our church at Charleston. Bro. W. M. Taylor, who succeeds him in New Orleans, reports that work is in splendid condition and speaks highly of the retiring pastor.

—J. H. Coultard, formerly of Owasso, Mich., is now preaching for the congregation at Paw Paw, same state. Paw Paw will be in the van of the churches making contributions to what our centennial may justly expect of Michigan by 1909.

—J. L. McDonald, 1833 East Seventeenth street, Anderson, Ind., is available as a pastor. Brother McDonald is a good man who has done good work in various states of the union and who is a pure and exemplary character. He ought to be set to work at once.

—Bro. H. A. Northcutt writes that J. W. Vance has recently located at Sulphur Springs, Tex., but will soon begin a meeting in Plano, Tex. He testifies to the great help Brother and Sister Zeran have been to him in a recent successful meeting at Sulphur Springs and elsewhere.

—The church at Deland, Fla., is without a preacher. No one but a well educated and capable man ought to go to that important place since it is the seat of a university and has a strong intellectual atmosphere. Men of the right type would do well to apply to W. H. Halsey.

—A young man of consecration and ability who can accept a salary of $650 or $700, where living is very cheap, is wanted for the ministry in Wiarton, Ontario, Canada. Address Bro. R. W. Stevenson, 568 Manning Avenue, Toronto.

—We call attention to the third report of the relief fund of the Christian churches at San Francisco, made by Hiram Van Kirk, financial secretary, in another column. One touch of misfortune makes all the world akin, but it makes brethren in the Lord particularly dear and helpful.

—O. L. Lyon, the tireless minister of the Newman (Ill.) church, reports six baptisms during the last two weeks and six other additions by letter. He testifies that Brother Brooks may still be used to great advantage even after Bro. Scoville has held a meeting for a church.

—Bros. J. J. Taylor and Arthur Haley are to hold another meeting, this time in a tent, in Montpelier, O., beginning July 29. These brethren held a meeting there last winter which resulted in the organization of a church in that place. The character of their work may well be understood by this return call within a year.

—T. F. Weaver writes that he has sold his interest in Grayson College and is no longer connected with that institution. He is now ready to serve any congregation that may need his help either in a pastoral or evangelistic capacity. We most cordially welcome Brother Weaver back into the ranks of our active ministry.

—Bro. M. B. Ingle, Harper, Kan., will hold a missionary protracted meeting in Wheatland, Wyo., during the summer. We have a few members in and about that town who are anxious to organize a church, secure a preacher and go to work. Brother Ingle has had much experience in this sort of pioneer work and will doubtless do it well.

—From "The Greeting," of Peoria, Ill., Harry Foster Burns, minister, we learn the church is agitating the question of a new building. Lacy Parks Schooling, the assistant pastor, will spend his vacation in study at the University of Chicago. Increased attention is being paid to the social life of the church and with very beneficial results.

—The church at Wilkesbarre, Pa., is two years old and has grown to a membership of two hundred under the minstry of E. E. Cowperthwaite. A more difficult field has probably never been entered by our people. It has required heroic work to bring things to their present condition. This baby church entertains the state convention July 31 to August 2.

—Bro. D. T. Stanley, our missionary in and about Birmingham, Ala., has made a splendid beginning in his work. He has organized a church at Woodlawn and is gathering people together in North Birmingham, where we have at least thirty members not yet organized into a church. We look for good permanent results in this important field.

—Bro. Finley Sapp was elected secretary of the South Dakota Christian Missionary Society during its recent convention in Carthage. Brother Sapp has had experience in this form of work in other states and brings to his new task both knowledge and capacity for the work. We will hope to hear good reports of the progress of the work in that important state.

—Bro. T. M. Johnson, of Quincy, Ill., a day or two ago went to his eternal reward. Brother Johnson was graduated from the Christian University, Canton, Mo., in 1874, and gave his life to the ministry from that time. He has been very successful as an evangelist and has done good work as a settled minister. Our sympathies go out to his wife and the children who mourn his departure.

—Bros. O. P. Spiegel and J. E. Sturgis, the latter singing evangelist, Butler, Ind., have recently closed a meeting in Jackson, Miss., where they organized a second church with fifty-two members. It is said that our people, duirng this meeting, had the best hearing in the history of our work in that city. A preacher has been called for the new congregation and the prospects are bright for a rapid and permanent growth.

—Bro. J. G. Wilson, Waldron, Mich., is familiar with many places in the state of Michigan in which we have no churches. His work among the Seventh Day Adventists took him to many towns in that state and revealed to him their religious conditions. He is desirous of going to Salt St. Marie to establish a church, however the support may come. We hope that he will not long be deterred and that ample support may be provided for him.

—Bro. C. A. Lowe, of St. Joseph, sends us a very interesting programme of the Seventh (Mo.) Missionary District, to be held at Camden Point, July 23-26. The names of many able men appear on the program. Excellent arrangements are made for the accommodation of visitors. The expense will not exceed 75 cents per day. Send name at once to Brother Lowe, 2316 South 15th St., and provision will be made for your entertainment.

—James A. Gordon, of Marshall, Mo., does not let his duties as cashier of the bank interfere seriously with his superintendency of the Bible school. During the year the school has paid $110 to our National Benevolent Association; $167 to foreign missions and $12.50 to state missions. The superintendent takes special pride in the fact that 85½ per cent of the average attendance of 194 read the Bible daily. This feature he commends to other schools.

—Bro. J. A. Banta, of Ten Sleep, Wyo., is probably the only settled minister among the disciples in that state. He knows of scores of places where we could organize churches if we could only find support for the preachers. The Home Society ought to have $5,000 to put into that field this year. Brother Banta begs for an evangelist to be sent to organize the churches and fully believes that they can be arranged into circuits which will be able to support the preachers.

—Elsewhere will be found an advertisement of Garrison Park on the east coast of Lake Michigan, but a day or night's ride from Chicago over the Pierre Marquette Railroad or by steamer daily to Muskagon by the Goodrich or Hackley line where connection is made with a small steamer or the railroad. This resort is winning golden opinions from all visitors because combining great beauty of scenery and perfect restfulness.

—Bro. C. V. Allison, of Mound City, Mo., reports the affairs of our church there to be most prosperous. Since the first of April three have been added to the membership, $60 given to home missions, a $75 Children's day offering and improvements made to the church and parsonage at a cost of $180. We safely expect such reports where a union has been effected between ministers like Brother Allison and such Disciples as he testifies constitute our Mound City church.

—Bernard P. Smith, who is in charge of our West End church in Atlanta, has voluntarily released the American Christian Missionary Society from any further aid for that work. The board had passed an appropriation for another year's work, but Brother Smith knowing the great pressure of appeals upon us and our inability to answer them, has come to our rescue by declaring the church self supporting, at least while he is minister. We commend this action to a hundred congregations among us.

—Bro. James P. Orr, one of the pioneers in the Church of Christ, being some 80 years of age, is removing from Lebanon, Ind, to the Pacific coast. He came to Cincinanti in the early fifties and was the publisher of Benjamin Franklin's paper for a number of years. He taught school and practiced medicine in Cincinnati and preached the Gospel far and wide without money and without price. In speaking of his acquaintance in Cincinnati he pathetically remarks, "Spring Grove Cemetery holds most of my friends and acquaintances."

—The Western Washington Christian Missionary Society at its recent convention elected the following board of officers: F. Waldon, president, Seattle; R. H. Ellett, C. H. Hilton, A. D. Skaggs, vice-presidents; R. E. Dunlap, corresponding secretary; A. L. Chapman, recording secretary; U. E. Harmon, treasurer; W. A. Moore, superintendent of Sunday-schools; E. E. Francis, superintendent of Christian Endeavor work. This is a strong organization and ought to mean much in the forwarding of the work in the western part of that state.

—Mrs. Mary Varney and her husband, of Baltimore, have recently presented the American Christian Missionary Society a corner lot, 75x115, in Port Huron, Mich. The society is under obligations to organize a Christian church in that city of 22,000 inhabitants within two years of the delivery of the deed. We ought to have had a church in this city long ago, for it is an important place and growing rapidly. It is hoped that one year hence a good church will be started in that city, it having been made possible by the beneficence of these two good persons.

—The editorial sanctum was brightened on the eve of the Fourth by a wedding party, in which Miss Elizabeth Wilhite and James Coe were the bright and particular stars. The young couple are members of the Jacksonville (Ill.) congregation, where our general superintendent formerly ministered, and came to the city that he might pronounce to them the magic ceremonial. Our confidence in their permanent happiness and usefulness is strengthened by their making THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST one of the institutes of their new home.

—The Clifton church, in Louisville, Ky., Bro. T. S. Tinsley, pastor, has organized a mission at Crescent Hill. The Clifton church, on June 2, took up an offering of $134 for this new work. They have adopted as their Centennial aim "Seven Hundred Members in the Local Church," "Found and Foster Another Congregation," "Keep United, Evangelistic and Missionary." They are urging all their members in the vicinity of the newly founded mission to cast in their influence there and make work a success. We commend this action to a hundred other churches.

—The state board of North Carolina is doing some splendid work in the way of extension. They are about to enter Wilmington, the largest city, and establish a church there. They have recently organized a church in Windsor and are building houses of worship at Freemont and Rocky Mount where congregations were recently established. Houses of worship are under way at the points where the churches were established last year. With the material development of North Carolina our people ought to enter the state and establish a church in every considerable community.

—J. A. L. Romig, of Manitoba, is in a meeting with C. C. Redgrave at Port Arthur, Ontario. Port Arthur will, ere long, be a city of 20,000 inhabitants, for it is a rapidly growing city. Within a few years it will be one of the great commercial centers of the British Northwest. Now is the time for us to lay the foundation of a great work. Brother Redgrave has need of assistance and could use with fine effect a small printing press if some one could furnish it. Who is the man who will supply leaves of healing for the nation by sending this good man the machine with which to print them?

—The Editor, writing from his new summer home at Pentwater, Michigan, advises that it will save him much writing if we will announce that persons preferring to come to Pentwater by steamer rather than railroad would better take the Goodrich or Hackley line of daily steamboats from Chicago to Muskegon which will connect with either the morning or evening trains for Pentwater. The "Kansas" has discontinued its trip directly to Pentwater until the channel is deepened, which may require some time. There are two or three desirable cottages in Pentwater for rent which yet be secured by prompt application.

—Roger H. Fife, evangelist, and Herbert H. Saunders, singer, recently closed an evangelistic meeting resulting in eighteen additions in Durand, Mich. This about doubles the membership of the church and insures its permanency. The pastor is J. A. Canby, a consecrated and able man. The prominent feature of this meeting was the street preaching. Many evenings during the continuance of the meeting the evangelist and a corps of workers repaired to a prominent down town street corner where they both sang and preached the Gospel. They made use of tracts and charts which admirably set forth the work being done by the Disciples. Hundreds of persons thus heard who otherwise would have known nothing of our meeting.

For a Church in New Hampshire.

Already acknowledged	$510 10
Hon. M. M Cochran	25 00
Wm. Carey	10 00
Total	$545 10

—Brother Herbert T. Yeuell, one of our most successful evangelists, is now preaching the primitive Gospel to great audiences in Manchester, and trying to establish our first church in New Hampshire. On account of hall rents, advertising and other expenses being higher than anticipated, this meeting will cost probably much more than the original estimate of $1,000, if held long enough to give our plea a fair trial in that part of New England. Unless our people express greater financial interest we fear the meeting must come to a premature close. We ask our liberal-hearted brethren to make generous and immediate gifts for this purpose. They will be gladly acknowledged in this column.

Sweet Spring (Mo.) Convention.

The convention of the district No. 2 convenes in Sweet Springs July 16-18. We are making preparation for the reception and the enjoyment of what promises to be a great convention. Sweet Springs has hospitality large enough and wide enough to include every Christian within the borders of the seventeen counties composing district No. 2. We desire that you come in large delegations, with overflowing enthusiasm, to enjoy the best of programs, as well as the most generous hospitality. The sessions are to be held in the Sweet Springs Park, one of "God's first temples."

If you are coming, write. Only those who announce their coming need expect to be met with a carriage and brass band. Finally, come! All come!!

Eastern Ohio Ministerial Association.

In view of the fact that nearly fifty preachers, the most of whom are members of "The Ministerial Association of the Disciples of Christ in Eastern Ohio" have signed "A Call to Conference and Prayer in behalf of the special objects of the Century Movement," to be held in Hiram, Aug. 5-12, 1906. it has seemed best to hold the sessions of the Ministerial Association during the same week and at Hiram. The members of the association will take notice and are urged to be present. The place is an ideal one for a few days' rest and recreation. No formal program will be issued but questions of current importance will be considered, and such business transacted as may be necessary. In case of necessary absence members are asked to address the association by a letter to the corresponding secretary.

Annual Report of Liberty (Mo.) Church.

Although we have been worshiping in the court house for the past fourteen months pending the completion of our new church, we have had a good year. There have been forty-eight additions to the church. Our financial budget shows a total of $3,166. The combined missionary offerings amount to $684. I have preached 105 sermons here at home and 77 elsewhere. There have been seven deaths in the church during the last church year. The Liberty church is girding herself for greater things. Although we have been under the strain of erecting an expensive church, none of our missionary offerings have been neglected. Peace and harmony prevail and we begin our new church year with gratitude and hope. Graham Frank, Minister.

Bethany College and the Brotherhood.

The present healthy condition of the institution founded by Alexander Campbell is a matter of congratulation with every member of the body known as Disciples of Christ. Five years ago the trustees and faculty felt a crisis had come and were fearful that the college must close. Those entrusted with its management had done heroic and self-sacrificing service for a number of years and were greatly discouraged. Thomas E. Cramblet was called to the presidency, and under his vigorous and wise direction, with the co-operation of the faculty and trustees, and the generous support of the alumni and friends of the institution, the college has once more been put upon its feet and is doing to-day as excellent work in the cause of education as at any period in its history. The work of the college has been of a character to commend itself to the brotherhood during all these sixty-five years of its existence. What would our cause be if Bethany and its work were blotted out?

There is much yet to be done if we discharge our obligation to this school of the prophets. We would commend it to our people as a nourishing mother for their sons and daughters, and urge upon them to remember its claims with their substance and aid us in making it every way worthy of a great memory and a great cause.

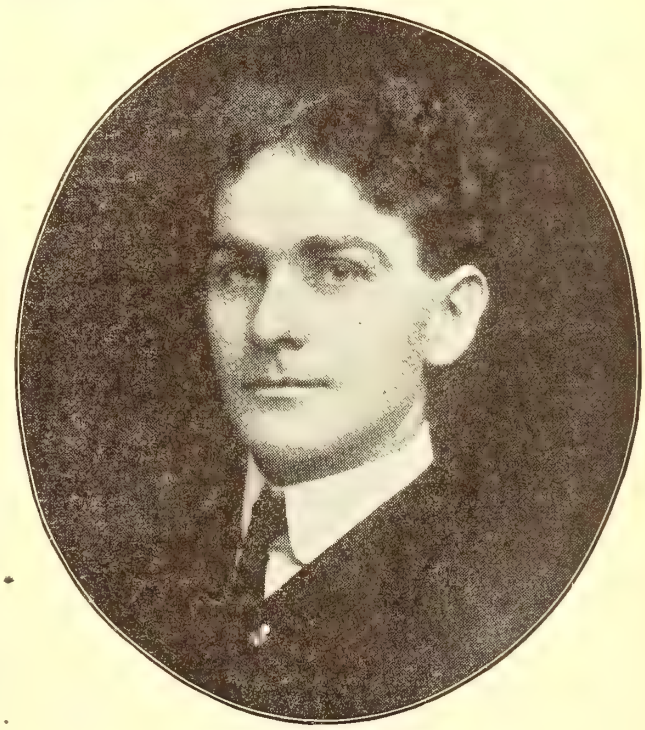
Church Dedications.



C. O. Reynard.

The new church home of the Lansdowne (Ill.) congregation was dedicated July 1. Geo. L. Snively, of The Christian-Evangelist, assisted Pastor C. O. Reynard through the day's services. Fifteen hundred dollars were needed to pay the indebtedness on the building and for an adjoining parsonage plat; $1,630 were given and three valuable members added to the membership. Lansdowne is a beautiful and rapidly growing suburb of East St. Louis. Ours is the only church there and members of other religious bodies are co-operating with our brethren in the work of the Lord, several having already taken membership and others will. This bids fair to soon be a strong church. Its success should encourage our brethren in other cities to be first to establish missions in suburbs and rapidly growing communities. Great credit is due Brother Reynard and his talented young wife for the rapid and superb development of this church. Brother Snively has been asked to further assist in a meeting during October.

A fine brick church was dedicated at Poplar Hill, Ontario, on Lord's day, July 1 and 2. free of debt. The edifice is a model of neatness and up-to-dateness, and shows what high aspirations this congregation has for the cause of Christ in this locality. It cost a little over $8,000, and over $3,000 were pledged during the day. J. M. Van Horn, of Toronto, preached morning and evening and Principal F. E. Lumley, assisted by the Sinclair College Band, had charge of the afternoon service and the Monday evening service.

Brother Van Horn preached excellent sermons and the close attention given by the closely packed audience showed how interested all were in the great day. He has made many friends at this place and his general enthusiasm for the work proves how invaluable he is as a worker in Ontario.

Let this be an inspiration to many another church to get alive and experience the joy that comes from dedicating a church free from debt.

To the Churches of Tidewater District.

Dear Brethren—The annual meeting of the Tidewater District Convention will meet this year at Jerusalem Church, King William county, Va., August 7-9. We request that all churches in the district send delegates, and we extend to them and to all preaching brethren a cordial invitation. They will come to Lestor Manor, and there be met by stage or private conveyance. Trains reach Lestor Manor at 9 a. m. going south and 4 p. m. and 5:30 p. m. going north. Delegates will be met at 9 a. m. and 4 p. m. only.

Modern Religious Persecution.

book. Such was not the case in the days when the persecutor was respected, and his judgment heeded; when the books as well as the person of the heretic could be, by law, consigned to the flames. Yet these are those who deprecate the mild measures of the present time against false teaching.

There are those among the Disciples who have even gone so far as to charge these faithful defenders of "our plea" with dishonesty and insincerity. They have asked: How could they charge such ugly things against men who are known to be kind in their families and devout and pure in their personal and religious lives? The answer is very easy. It is all the greater evidence of the fidelity and sincerity of the persecutor that, knowing the personal life and character of the heretic, and the esteem in which he is held by those who know him, in spite of it and of almost probable misconstruction of his motives, he should go faithfully on to warn the unsophisticated and unwary against him. Such courage does not fear the face of man, and is given to but few, and they, the chosen of God.

of God on earth, his one and only family, the true, the real, the genuine Church of Christ universal!

Money can nowhere be spent with greater advantage than in this field, so ripe for the harvest of God. It is the most blessed foreign mission work I know of, and it is right at our own doors. We do not have to cross the ocean for it, nor labor under the deadly equatorial sun in carrying it on. We all ought to co-operate together and utilize to its fullest extent this God-given opportunity right in our own midst, in our homeland, among the best citizens of any land on earth.

It is by earnest request from others that I submit this sketch of my life and this work to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and I do it with most humble heart, feeling my utter dependency upon God in so great an undertaking. I earnestly ask your prayers, one and all, for wisdom, grace and strength, and all things needed. I rejoice to know that I am in the fullest possible fellowship with every true Disciple of Christ throughout the world, who may be reading these lines. I say from the heart, God bless you all!

must bear in mind that the political Puritans passed away. The disciplinary Puritans are no more, for they are not needed. But the doctrinal Puritans live and flourish, for they represent the purity and simplicity of faith as opposed to formalism and sacerdotalism, while they stand for reliance on the Word of God alone with liberty of conscience to interpret and practise it.

Back to the Puritans.

Luther, Wiclif, Calvin, Latimer, Ridley, Wesley, Howe, Charnock, Toplady, Whitefield, Rowland Hill, Alexander Campbell, Spurgeon, all were Puritans. All differed, but all called the people back to the Bible. All made some mistakes, but each in his way and according to the emphasis which he felt impelled to place on some vital element of truth that had been forgotten or perverted was an exponent of apostolic doctrine. These men were all massive Bible scholars and masterly Bible teachers. I think that the chief lack in the theological colleges to-day is the neglect of the works of the Puritan divines and expositors. The very names of Sibbes, Brooks, Owen, Caryl, Charnock and Adams are unknown to large numbers of students and graduates. Who could study Owen's great treatise on "The Holy Spirit" without becoming conscious of a new power of understanding the New Testament? When I came as a novice under the care of the late C. H. Spurgeon one of his first items of counsel was that I should master Charnock on "The Divine Attributes," a profoundly spiritual work. I was by no means advised to plunge solely into the treasures of the Tudor period for Spurgeon at the same time put into my hands a beautiful volume then just out, "The Synonyms of the Greek Testament," by Archbishop Trench. And as years have rolled on I have discovered that the preachers who have most potently shaped the character of the people and have established churches which live and influence society around them, are the men who have drunk closely at the fountain of pure Puritanism. If they have also quaffed of the Parnassian stream or the classic springs of Helicon, then their literary culture is of no small additional value. The most acceptable preacher is the man of blended classic scholarship and Puritan learning, of course allowing that he is endowed with the power of persuasive appeal.

Conventions.

Iowa Christian Convention.

The Athens of Iowa—Iowa City—entertained the convention this year. The sessions lasted two days and were presided over by President T. J. Dow and Vice President J. H. Ingraham. The reports of corresponding secretary and treasurer showed substantial increase in additions to the churches and offerings for the work. The general fund receipts amounted to $12,102.12, and the reported additions were 6,533. Drake University reports showed a steady progress in every department. The year's enrollment of students was 1,634. President Hill M. Bell spoke with justifiable pride of the "Era of Good Feeling" inaugurated three years ago by the students voluntarily giving up "class rushes" and doing away with fraternities. The plan of work committees of the I. C. C. and the Bible School Association recommended in their reports that the Bible school work be done under the direction of the I. C. C. board of managers, the I. C. C. to receive all sums raised for state Bible school work and be responsible for all bills. The discussion of this recommendation was protracted. Finally the assembly disposed of the matter by referring it to the I. C. C. and Bible school boards. The members of these boards will thrash the matter out at a meeting in Des Moines later on and the result will be made known to the brotherhood of the state. At the opening session Monday evening, June 25, Percy Leach, minister of the entertaining church, welcomed the delegates in behalf of the Christian people of the city, and Mayor Ball, in behalf of the citizens. D. R. Dungan responded to the greetings and words of welcome in a very felicitous way. The opening address was by Bro. H. D. Williams, of Ames, on "The Relation of Our Movement to Other Religious Bodies." I send you separately, for publication, a synopsis of this address. The convention address the day following, by Bro. G. B. Van Arsdall, of Cedar Rapids, was, simply expressed, grand. A resolution presented by Hill M. Bell that the address be taken by the secretary of the Centennial committee, W. R. Warren, and that it be printed in pamphlet form and widely distributed throughout the country, was unanimously passed.

W. J. Wright and S. J. Corey represented the Home and Foreign Missionary Societies, respectively. They delivered admirable addresses. Other speakers were: I. N. McCash, in the interests of temperance work; Chaplain C. S. Medbury, Joel Brown, J. B. Buxton, A. M. Haggard and D. R. Dungan, for Drake; W. B. Clemmer, for Endeavor Society; S. H. Zendt and J. H. Bryan, for Bible school work; also J. H. Hardin, of Missouri, Eugene Curless, E. F. Leake, D. B. Allen, Carl C. Davis, H. E. Van Horn and R. W. Lilly. A few of the speakers who were to talk for "twenty minutes only" took from forty minutes to sixty-five to get rid of their productions, to the great inconvenience of "business," and to the exclusion of other listed speakers. Mrs. Arthur J. Fawcett and Mrs. J. M. Vankirk rendered acceptable singing. Lawyer C. L. Hays, of Eldora, a member of the committee on "Plan of Work," presented the following resolution, which was unanimously and heartily adopted by the convention:

> "Resolved, That we again express our approval of the temperance work carried on by the Anti-Saloon League and our full sympathy with and confidence in the superintendent of the Iowa League, Dr. I. N. McCash, in his consecrated work, and we commend to the Christian citizens everywhere their full support of this efficient means of combatting the evils of the saloon and the glory of the rising tide setting toward personal temperance in America."

The devotional meetings of the convention were led by Arthur Long, Burlington; Milton H. H. Lee, Fort Dodge; W. B. Clemmer, Council Bluffs; B. W. Pettitt, Avery; and S. M. Perkins, Albia. The attendance at the convention was about 200 from outside the city. But the euthusiasm over the grand reports of progress and the bright outlook for the current year, made every session interesting and profitable. The convention next year goes to Des Moines, the Christian bodies there to determine where the meetings shall be held. W. J. Wright so interested the delegates in a simultaneous evangelistic campaign for Iowa that a resolution of President T. J. Dow to hold such a campaign the coming winter was heartily endorsed.

The I. C. C. officers elected were:

State Board—President, J. Madison Williams, Des Moines; vice president, F. L. Moffitt, Centerville; recording secretary, J. J. Grove, Ames; corresponding secretary, B. S. Denney, Des Moines; treasurer, J. M. Lucas, Des Moines.

Assembly Officers—President D. R. Dungan, Des Moines; vice president, F. D. Ferrell, Bloomfield; second vice president, E. F. Leake, Newton; first secretary, T. J. O'Connor, Eldora; second secretary, M. H. H. Lee, Ft. Dodge; superintendent Christian Endeavor, W. B. Clemmer, Council Bluffs.

University Trustees—J. W. Hill, Des Moines, one year; H. M. Whennery, Des Moines, two years.

Other officers named by the convention were the trustees of the anti-saloon league, they being, Hill M. Bell, president of the university, and D. H. Buxton.

The delegates to the American convention of the anti-saloon league to be held next November at St. Louis will be Dr. I. N. McCash and John T. Houser, of Des Moines; F. D. Ferrell, of Bloomfield; R. W. Lilly, of Corydon and Arthur Long, of Burlington. T. J. O'Connor, Sec.

Nicholson, of Redwood Falls, and B. V. Black, of Mankato. C. S. Osterhus, of Ossian, Ia., presented "The Unity Movement Amongst Norwegians," to a large and interested audience.

Thursday afternoon and evening was devoted to the work of the C. W. B. M. The principal speakers were Miss Mary Kingsbury, of Bilaspur, India, and Mrs. Louise Kelley, of Emporia, Kan. Miss Kelley gave a splendid address on Wednesday evening. Brother Corey of Cincinnati, also presented the cause of world-wide missions on behalf of the F. C. M. S., at this service.

On Friday morning after the business of the convention was concluded we listened to an address by Bro. J. H. Mohorter, on the "Work of the Benevolent Association;" also to an address by Brother Henry, representing the Business Men's Association. The convention closed Friday noon.

The following is a condensed report of the corresponding secretary, J. H. Bicknell: Number of churches, 41; present membership, 3,274; baptized during the past year, 345; otherwise received, 185. Total additions, 530. Total losses, 175. Net gain in membership, 355. Scholars in Bible schools, 2,217; C. E., 491; Juniors, 213. Money raised for local work, $28,411.81; for home missions, $673.89; foreign missions, $948.01; state missions, $1,070.82; church extension society, $170.37; C. W. B. M., $780.35; for other purposes, $9,198.43. Grand total money raised for all purposes, $40,280.68.

Three new churches have been organized during the year—Fairmount, Simpson and Cresco. During the year the state board has had the state evangelist, C. R. Neel, in the field constantly evangelizing. Under his splendid ministry the work has been greatly strengthened.

Most of the churches show a good year's work. The crying need of this field is men—consecrated men to do the work of the ministry. No less than eighteen churches are without pastors. C. R. Neel was re-employed as state evangelist.

The following officers were elected for the coming year: President, M. R. Waters; vice president, A. D. Harmon; treasurer, Charles Oliver; recording secretary, Baxter Waters; corresponding secretary, J. H. Bicknell; superintendent of Bible school, C. B. Osgood; superintendent of C. E., B. V. Black. J. H. Bicknell.

The Dakota Convention.

The convention of the churches of South Dakota and North Dakota was held at Carthage, June 21-24, with about seventy delegates enrolled. The program compared favorably wih those of older states. The National Boards were all represented.

The addresses of William J. Wright, of the Home Board, and Stephen J. Corey, of the Foreign Society, were both of a high order and heartily received. Dean A. M. Haggard, of Drake University, was also present and delivered a stirring address on Education, in which a strong and appealing plea was made for the broadest and most thorough training under Christian influences, that the student may attain adequate equipment to meet the demands of the age.

The earnestness and inspiration of all the visiting speakers will have a lasting influence for good in the development of the work in the Dakotas. All regret that C. C. Smith could not fill his place on the program, he being called to Jamaica. Also G. W. Muckley, the apostle of Church Extension, was obliged to be absent in order to respond to an urgent call elsewhere. The writer delivered addresses in behalf of the Board of Church Extension and the National Benevolent Association. About $140 were pledged for state work, and over $200 for Carthage and Lead. The following will compose the Board for the coming year: President, A. H. Seymour, Arlington; Vice President, E. E. Headley, Bradley; Treasurer, J. B. Moore, Aberdeen; Recording Secretary, William Carry, Tyndall; Corresponding Secretary, F. B. Sapp, Aberdeen; Members at large, C. P. Gregory, Aberdeen, and J. B. Meharg, Verdon. The state officers for the C. W. B. M. will be: President, Mrs. F. B. Cannon, Aberdeen; Vice President, Mrs. Hackman, Sioux Falls; Treasurer, Mrs. Minnie Branson, Platte; Recording Secretary, Miss Verna Dahlstrom, Clark; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Edith White, Lead.

The next convention will be held at Parker, S. D. G. W. Elliott, editor of the "Oracle" at Brookings, made a good report on Literature, as chairman of that committee. He is doing good service in the distribution of tracts and other literature. The work is looking up and the future is full of hope. Two families drove over 100 miles to the convention. The South Dakota brethren are not floating with the current, but rowing up stream. Success is sure to come to them in the heroic work being done.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

India Notes.

The Bible college commencement in Jubbulpore took place on May 8. This year there were two graduates, one of whom goes to Mahoba and one to Hatta. During the past year there were twenty students. Brother Adams came over from Bilaspur to deliver the commencement address, and we also had with us Mr. R. Burges, the general secretary of the India Sunday-school Union, who made some very appropriate remarks. The students took a great deal of interest in the exercises and decorated the building with plants and flowers. The closing meetings developed a spiritual interest which they will no doubt carry with them for some time. After commencement the students scattered, going to various stations where they will preach and sell books and engage in other works until work begins again in the Bible college in July.

We are planning this year to have a two weeks' summer school for the mission helpers. Several of our missionaries will be present and deliver lectures on various themes, all calculated to freshen up the minds of those who have been out of school for some time, and hence are beginning to rust, as it were. Considerable interest is taken in this and we are sure it will be a success.

Death has once more invaded our mission ranks. On May 28 Miss Lyda Gertrude Archer died of diabetes, at Landour, Mussoorie. She was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Brown. She had been ill for some time, but of late had not suffered particularly. When the time came for a six weeks' vacation at Landour she rejoiced greatly, feeling that by going to the mountains she would become free from disease and have a happy time. Her hopes were indeed fulfilled, but in a different way from what she had anticipated. A pure, sweet, simple-minded girl, she was greatly loved by all who knew her, and will be greatly missed by many.

Sickness has laid his hand on another station. Brother Stubbin's two children in Hatta, have both been attacked with smallpox, but have recovered. One of them had a very severe case. We have just heard that the mother, too, is now afflicted with the disease. There has been an epidemic of smallpox in this and several other localities. Brother Stubbin tried to have his family vaccinated, but it was impossible to obtain the necessary virus. Living, as they do, twenty-two miles from a railroad, with no Europeans near them, their trial has been doubly severe. Dr. Mary McGavran, from Damoh, however, stayed with them throughout the time of illness.

India is now full of disease and suffering. Famine and pestilence are scattered far and wide. Half a million people are receiving aid from the government in some way or other. Usually they are employed on what are called "relief works." These usually take of the form of constructing roads, railways, reservoirs and sometimes public buildings, in the localities where there is scarcity. Thousands of other people have left their homes and are wandering in other localities in search of work. Had it not been for the prompt action taken by the government there is no doubt but that we should have had a severe famine with much suffering and death. Disease often visits these relief camps. Near Maudaha, 26,000 were employed. Cholera broke out among them, the camp had to be broken up, and the disease was scattered far and wide. Rath is now suffering from it. Jubbulpore has had it, though not as an epidemic, for some time. Smallpox is in numerous places. All are praying for seasonable rains this year, so that there may not be so much distress and illness.

Lately three deaths occurred among the native Christians in Harda. Two were of native helpers, and one the child of a helper. Yet in spite of all these things the missionaries are hopeful. Here and there conversions are occurring and everywhere the work seems to be growing. We believe the hand of God is with us.

Minnesota as a Mission Field.

The hosts of Disciples gathered in annual convention with the First Church, St. Paul, June 19-22.

We are not great in numbers in Minnesota—only 43 churches, with a membership of 3,000, with a net increase of 355 in the past year. But while our gathering was not so large, the meetings and fellowship were very precious and cordial, and highly appreciated. There were many "scattered Disciples" who came up to this annual feast, and many preachers to whom this was their only opportunity during the year to look into the faces of their comrades. The convention was characterized by warmth of fellowship, brotherhood and reverence for the Lord's work and by faithful attendance at all sessions of the convention.

Minnesota is a great state; in area 80,000 square miles, rich in agriculture, commerce and mines. Its population is rapidly increasing. There are one million and a quarter Scandinavians in the state, 75,000 people who cannot speak the English tongue—in fact every other man you meet is a foreigner. The twin cities are Scandinavian headquarters in this country, and also the citadel of Roman Catholicism in the Northwest. The mining regions of the Range country are filled with foreigners of low type, morally and religiously.

C. S. Osterhus, of Ossian, Iowa, made an address before the convention on "Unity Work Among Scandinavians." He says there is a great "coming out" among these people. They are breaking away from creeddom and are now as sheep having no shepherd. He says they are coming together in groups, some partly organized for religious work, and that now there are as many as 200 of these groups holding meetings and seeking religious light and freedom; they are ready for a pure Gospel. There are 76,000 Scandinavians in Minneapolis alone, and 56,000 of these are not identified with any church whatsoever. Here is a great mission field. Brother Osterhus needs a paper to augment his work.

Our convention program was good, in fact capital. We were favored with the presence of Wright, Muckley, Corey and Mohorter, Mrs. Louise Kelly and Miss Mary Kingsbury, of Bilaspur, India, and others who made noble impressions on our people and blessed us with streams of enthusiasm, and the larger vision. To J. H. Bicknell, corresponding secretary, much praise is due for his zealous efforts and for the splendidly prepared report. A. D. Harmon presided over the convention in the absence of the president. Brother and Sister A. P. Frost, who now live at Winona, were present and gave many a word of cheer at the needed moment.

There is a note of optimism and faith among the Minnesota workers and preachers. With all its difficulties and discouragements, there are signs of growth. In the past year C. R. Neel, state evangelist, has held some good meetings; among them, Winona, Mankato, Howard Lake, Garden City, and others. He will continue this year under the state board. C. B. Osgood is doing a strong, manly work at Winona. E. C. Nicholson is in the midst of building a fine church at Redwood Falls. The work at Fairmont has made rapid growth under J. P. Child. B. V. Black has recently located at Mankato and is pushing things with vigor. Among the new preachers are: P. J. Rice, at Portland avenue, Minneapolis; Fred M. Lindenmeyer, at Willow Creek; Rochester Irwin, at Rochester; W. D. Baumer, at Pleasant Grove; A. J. Wilson, at Plainview.

The church at Duluth has just held their annual meeting. Reports show decided gains in all departments. The church is harmonious and hopeful. With a membership of only 150 they raised over $2,500 in the past year.

Baxter Waters, Rec. Sec.

Ohio to-day sits in mourning for her dead governor. John M. Pattison, soldier, high grade citizen, clean business man, unspotted politician, governor, Christian gentleman, is dead, and another rules. He never saw the state house from the day of his inauguration. But his manly dignity and high ideals in his campaign last fall and while in office, has made a lasting impression for good. May the Lord of his life lead us who live after him.——Three Ohio preachers have resigned since the last letter. O. D. Maple has done what seemed the impossible at Marion. But he has decided to turn the reins over to another.——J. J. Cole has fixed the day for his final sermon at Millersburg. E. J. Meacham will preach a farewell at Wilmington July 29. These are three good fields with plenty of hard work for some devoted and wise men.——Collinwood will have the novelty of a union meeting following the Buffalo convention with J. M. Rudy, of Missouri, as evangelist. This will be the first effort of that kind in Ohio and it will be watched with peculiar interest. Three churches—Congregational, M. E. and "ours," will unite.——T. L. Fowler has very wisely yielded to the overtures of the people at Minerva and has withdrawn his resignation. We want to keep such men in Ohio. Minerva is to be congratulated.——The Congregational preachers of Cleveland and the Presbyterian preachers of the same city played a game of ball at League Park June 25. The gate receipts went to the Y. M. C. A. The query is, what was it, Christian union, federation or foolishness?——On the same day and time the preachers who are simply Christians held their annual picnic at Euclid Beach, to which the wives, children and sweethearts were invited. It was a very enjoyable occasion and all voted it more profitable than a ball game.——Robert Chapman, of North Eaton, goes to Butler, Ind., July 1. He has been at North Eaton for nearly five years and has done a substantial work. We are sorry to lose him from Ohio, but commend him heartily to the Hoosiers.——Rushsylvania is beginning a new church building. It has been long needed. S. L. Lyons is pushing the project.——All the churches of Columbus joined in a union picnic June 20. About 1,000 people were in attendance.—C. A. Freer, Painesville, O.

He has only been at work there three months and twenty have already been added to the Lord at regular services. Keep your eyes on Wymore. Brother Cobbey is a child of the Beatrice church, and just now we can announce that his brother, Jean Cobbey, has entered the ministry.——H. C. Holmes, pastor at Fairbury, is very busy caring for the increase of his flock. The writer went down to his church a short time ago and addressed the business men's club. The visit was an enjoyable one.——The church here at Beatrice is building. We are having fine audiences and feel that we are doing good work. There have been thirty-seven added to the church locally since my coming here, January 1, a great many of whom have been conversions.——Charles Reign Scoville is to hold a meeting for us in our new church in 1907.——Mrs. Princess Long recently completed a tour of Nebraska towns in concert work. There was a unanimous demand that she come back to the Chautauqua next season. She will always be greeted with a full house at Beatrice.——H. S. Souders, of Beatrice, has begun work at Lawn. He has been a faithful member of the church here.——M. B. Baumer is expecting to enter the active ministry again. On account of sickness in his family and the failure of his own health he has been teaching for the past year. These last two mentioned are good men and I presume will be kept busy.—J. E. ful works wrought by our God since those heroic days when "our fathers," almost single-handed, planted amidst the confusion, discord and strife of a divided church, the banner of the primitive Gospel. What a forceful impulse would be given to this reformation by the erecting of such memorial structures. Plant them by the rolling rivers, on whose banks our immortal pioneers preached the unpolluted Word and beneath whose glancing wavelets they buried in baptism the confessors of fifty years ago. Plant them in the rural haunts, where the dear old country church has kept pure the spiritual atmosphere and is training a multitude of young men and women who afterwards drift to the cities and make the blood and sinew of our strongest congregations. Plant them where a handful of determined and dauntless disciples have kept the faith and kept the ordinances, when all the city ignored or all the neighborhood despised. Any of these places—all of them—are suitable for such memorial buildings. What matter whether it be in sequestered nook, by running brooks and sunny hay fields and fruitful orchards; or on western plains, fanned by the perfumed breezes of summer and swept by the fierce winter blasts; or in the prosperous county seat, that center of irresistible influence; or in the crowded city, on the busiest thoroughfares of human life? Every place belongs to Christ, and in every place, as we push forward the interests of his church there is the thrill of those who stand on hallowed ground;

> "Brothers, we are treading
> Where the saints have trod."

Oh, that the heart of our brotherhood may be moved to make such gifts to God, sacred and permanent, to bless the generations to come. Here the princely gift of one who consecrates his wealth to the Savior, and here the combined gifts of others of lesser means. And every memorial building, with the "century mark" upon it, will be sacred to the highest purposes, as in humility of heart and gladness of gift and joy of service the builders shall say:

> "Oh Thou whose own vast temple stands,
> Built over earth and sea;
> Accept the walls that human hands
> Have raised to worship Thee."

There were 16 heads of families, 9 men of high standing and influence; 14 families represented; 1 came from the Roman Catholic Church; 1 had formerly been a saloon keeper. Brother Northcutt moved many to tears by his sacred eloquence. Prof. Zeran and Mrs. Zeran are very helpful indeed. The meeting is a great victory for the cause of religion, as there has been but little manifestation of the revival spirit for some time. There were 6 additions the last night of the meeting.—J. W. JESUS TEACHING HOW TO PRAY. —Luke 11:1-13.

Memory verses, 9, 10.

Golden Text.—Lord, teach us to pray. —Luke 11:1.

Having left Galilee for the last time, Jesus had made a visit to the vicinity of Jerusalem and had then gone across Jordan to the east, to the place where John had first baptized (John 10:40). Here it was that the disciples asked him to teach them. His answer was substantially that contained in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6). According to Matthew, it appears that the Sermon on the Mount was a connected discourse delivered immediately after the calling of the Twelve, but many parts of it are repeated by the other evangelists in different settings. Such is the case with the Lord's Prayer and the other instructions about prayer. Perhaps Matthew meant merely to collect a number of the sayings of Jesus and not to indicate that they were all spoken on one occasion.

The petition that the name of God may be revered and his kingdom advanced. This precedes all personal requests. After this there are petitions for provision for temporal wants, for forgiveness of sins and for freedom from undue temptation. A simpler or a more comprehensive prayer was never composed. It is simple enough for the child, and profound enough for the philosopher.

The parable of the importunate friend is not meant to illustrate the spirit in which God answers prayer, but the certainty of his doing so. When one makes an inconvenient request of a friend, the power of friendship may fail, but even in such a case importunity may win. How much more will God give to him who earnestly and patiently asks, for his love can not fail as human friendship may.

"Ask—seek—knock." Here is a great principle of all life, true alike in temporal and spiritual things. It is only the asker who receives. It is only the seeker who finds. It is only when one knocks that the doors of success are opened. Enlargement and success do not happen in the spiritual any more than in the financial field. Effort, energy and aggression are the price of attainment.

This does not mean that the kingdom of heaven is to be taken by violence, or that hustle and bustle are the conditions of religious growth. Far from it. The asking may be the voiceless utterance of an earnest spirit. The seeking may be without organization or outcry. The knocking may be marked by no clamor. But in whatever way it manifests itself, the essential thing is that, with sincerity and urgency, with desire that shall not slacken and zeal that does not cool, the soul shall seek for God and all good things.

THE PRAYER OF CHRIST—Matt. 14:23; 26:36-44.

T. Thanksgiving.	Mark 8:6-9.
F. In the Name of Christ.	Eph. 5:14-21.

S. Submission.	Matt. 26:36-44.

While our Savior drank the bitter cup of human guilt that he prayed might pass by him, the prayer availed for such an increase of strength and fortitude as to minimize or neutralize its baleful effects upon him. Likewise our own prayers will either divide our burden or double our strength.

God hears and answers every prayer of his children—"Yes" or "No." We should be as grateful for the nays as the yeas. Oftentimes it is afterward given us to see the folly of what we have sought, and the refusal of which brought us low with grief. Rest assured every disposition of our prayers is as wise and loving whether or not we ever see the sequel.

Prayer means more than mere personal petition; it is the true confessional and intercessional; it is the best time and place for praise, thanksgiving and adoration; its intimate communion possibilities if fully realized will send us forth with face lights glowing like those of Moses. Recall the spirit of our former prayers and if we can detect selfishness there, let us protect our future prayers from this blight by truer harmony with "Thy will not mine be done."

Jesus was in prayer seeking deliverance rather from contact with the moral iniquity of the race than from the burden or the torture of the cross. It was necessary that he bear the weight of our sins and guilt upon Golgotha and his pure nature shrank from this sinful infusion and moral pollution. Just what heaven did for him we do not know, but he underwent the ordeal, the sacrifice availed for the sins of the race, the law is annulled and millions are rejoicing in the liberty wherewith Christ would make all free.

Rarely are long public prayers to be commended, but our private devotions could be greatly and profitably protracted. In the lesson Jesus has been praying one hour before approaching his apostles the first time. Doubtless all the time intervening between his coming into the garden and the betrayal was given to prayer; and during the night the disciples were on the storm-tossed deep he spent at least the first three watches in prayer. Surely our needs are no less, our strength no greater. Let him be our exemplar in prayer as in holiness and all things else.

It is very evident Jesus was praying not for a "reactionary influence" nor any other help to come from inherent powers, but to wholly extraneous sources of strength and comfort. To that same unwasting fulness we may have access through acceptable prayer. Only through prayer were Christ's needs met, and not otherwise will heaven come to our rescue. Even a little faith will bring some help. Whether the bay be large or small the tide will fill it from shore to shore from the ocean's abundance. Prayer is the tidal wave on whose crest ride out from heaven blessings configured to our needs and plenteous according to our faith.

A striking illustration of concessions gained through prayer is Abraham's intercession for Sodom and Lot, in the 18th of Genesis. In that compressed book as much space is given the account of this prayer as is accorded the genesis of nations. This reveals the Holy Spirit's desire that we may know our prayers are heard and answered. Solomon's prayer for wisdom is also a confirmation of our faith that the prayers of God's people are drafts heaven's bank will honor. Jesus also says seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you, ask and ye shall receive.

The New State of Oklahoma

Statehood for OKLAHOMA and Indian Territory will give this section a tremendous impetus in growth and development. Even now, the towns and cities are growing up, requiring more and demanding more; pushing wide-awake citizens who see the virtue of encouraging enterprises of every kind, in needfulness of getting more and better facilities, and more hands to develop the country.

Briefly, the condition is this: OKLAHOMA is really in need of nothing save people. More men are wanted. There are vast areas of unimproved land—land not yielding the crops of which it is capable. The same thing, in a different way, is true of the towns. Few lines of business are adequately represented. There are openings of all sorts—for mills and manufacturing plants, for small stores of all kinds, for banks, newspapers and lumber yards. Mechanics and professional men both are in demand.

Your Opportunity Now

while land is cheap and the country is settling up.

On July 17, August 7 and 21, exceptionally low rates will be made to OKLAHOMA; tickets good thirty days from date of sale and permitting stop-overs at pleasure. This rate, with the stop-over privileges, will enable you to thoroughly investigate every section of the new state.

LOVE AND FELLOWSHIP.—Epistle to Philemon.

Christ's so loving his enemies as to die for them should safeguard us against the deadly sin of carrying through life hearts empty of love for his brethren. For Christ's sweet sake fill them with a love that will not fail, though they seem to have no love for us, and apparently walk not with us, nor glorify our King before men.

Paul loved Onesimus more than the slave loved him for the apostle's heart was the larger. Paul, the liberator, did more for the bondman than the object of his love could do for him, for his heart was the larger, and the apostle derived infinitely greater joy from this historic commerce, for his heart was the larger. O, this world and the next belongs not to the great purses, arms or minds, but to the great hearts.

Constituted as we are, it is infinitely preferable to live in poverty and obscurity with a friend who loves us and can and will have fellowship with us in our anxieties and sorrows than to reign as absolute monarch over earth's greatest fortune or empire, but isolated from human sympathy and love and fellowship. Cultivate those qualities that will secure you at least one friend who will live or die for you, and you have a new possession next in value to God.

There is a grace in seeking love's favors that makes their bestowal a pleasure more than compensating for the sacrifice of the gift. Note well Paul's loving overture to Philemon, his gentle pleading for rather than demanding the liberty of his brother, and the expressions of confidence in the true nobility of his friend and the Christian courtesy of his conclusion. Let us attune our intercourse with our friends to this symphony of practical love and half the asperities of life will wing themselves away.

Evidently Onesimus was a bond servant or slave who fled from Philemon to Paul in quest of liberty and protection. Paul returns him to his master, not as a slave, but as a brother beloved. While the apostle can see that he has blessed the slave Onesimus by this liberation, he can but express the belief that he has blessed Philemon even more. As a slave, no matter how much Philemon received for his services, Onesimus was "unprofitable," but as a brother in the Lord, and so regarded and treated by his former master, he became "profitable," as all sacrificed objects, whether living or inanimate, are that help to the exaltation of the spirit over the flesh.

There is no lack of meaningless platitudes recited to the unfortunate, but they are as empty of comfort as of real earnestness. It was different with Jesus, Paul and all who have really assuaged earth's sorrows. "Jesus touched the bier," and by that act involved himself in ceremonial and real partnership with the widow whose only son is being borne to the tomb. So with the apostle in our lesson. He would put himself in bonds to Philemon to free Onesimus—"If he hath wronged thee or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account. I will repay it." It is this bearing of one another's burdens that gives the helper the joy of sacrifice, and the beneficiary the comfort and inspiration of human fellowship.

Loving thy neighbor as thyself is half the old law; "Do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith," is an apostolic injunction unto us who are under the dispensation of grace. A study of the doctrine reveals that we are to love the members of the body of Christ not simply because through the discipline of the Gospel they have become morally high toned and delectable and lovely, but we are to love them because of the fraternal relation we sustain to them in the household of faith, and in the family of God. We know nothing of the culture of Onesimus, nor of his disposition and temperament, but Paul loved him because he was his child in the faith as parents love children regardless of personal traits, and he confidently relies on Philemon's loving him because he was a child of the common faith. Many of us base our attitude toward our acquaintance wholly on our estimate of their merits; the Scriptures would largely modify that by the attitude of us all toward God. "Be kindly affectioned one to another in brotherly love."

Books by Disciples of Christ

The Scriptural Foundation for Christian Liberality.

I have read with pleasure the work of R. H. Lampkin, published by The Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, Mo. It is an attempt to study the foundations and trust of finance as related to the kingdom of God; it lays deep foundations in the knowledge of God's ownership of ourselves and of what we are, and attempts to find some principle that will regulate our conduct in the matter of our giving to the kingdom.

It is a very earnest study of this whole matter, and brings us to the tithe as simply one of the measures of Jewish giving. He develops the fact that beyond question Jews were required to pay two tithes, or one-fifth, of their entire income, with possibly a third tithe every third year for the work. The New Testament doctrine of giving is developed very fully indeed.

This is one of the most practical problems that is before the Church of Christ to-day. The cause of God could go forward with leaps and bounds if God's children would only deal as liberally with his cause to-day as did the Jews with their religion in the olden times.

I commend this book as a careful study and an earnest appeal to the consecrated of God's people. In the intense commercialism of this age, God's cause seems to be overlooked. This nation is wealthy beyond all precedent, and is growing wealthier each day. The question as to whether our wealth should be sanctified and God's cause advanced by it, or whether it should be used selfishly and thus to our condemnation as a nation, is one that ought to weigh heavily on the conscience of all who love God and his cause. I commend this book as a study of this great problem of financial obligation. Benj. L. Smith.

The Literature of the Disciples.

This dainty little volume by J. W. Monser, from the press of The Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis, will be enjoyed by all who are sufficiently interested in the literature of our people to inquire into its character and influence. It ought to be read by everybody. Brother Monser is qualified in unusual degree to discuss this subject, for he has from the beginning of his long and busy ministry been emphatically a man of books. Those who have conversed with him on the subject know what an omnivorous, yet thorough and discriminating student he is. He is appreciative, yet frankly critical; literary, but not finicky. He who picks up this monograph will not want to lay it down till he has reached its last page. The first three chapters deal with the origin, formation and classification of the publications that have been issued from the pages of "our own" writers. If any criticism is deserved here, it would be that Brother Monser has been too anxious to name every book that has appeared in the catalogs of our publishing houses, or at least every writer who has put pen to paper; even though, in some instances, it may be questioned if he has not spoilt both pen and paper in the process without sufficient compensation in the product. It would have been better, it seems to the writer, if Brother Monser had treated more fully in the body of his work of the really meritorious works which our brethren have produced (which are ample in number to fill the long chapter devoted to that purpose), and added a few pages of Bibliography at the end of the volume. This might not satisfy every ambitious scribe among us, but it would have comported better with the aim of such a work. The succeeding chapters, which are the critical portion of the work, are in Brother Monser's best vein, and will be read with increasing delight for their vigorous thought, epigrammatic language and intensely graphic style. On the whole, Brother Monser and The Christian Publishing Company are to be congratulated on bringing out so readable, timely and fair a treatment of the literature of a people whose efforts in book-making are yet to bring their noblest results.

Ten Plagues of Modern Life.

This is the title of a book of more than 200 pages, by I. N. McCash, for many years pastor of the University Place Christian Church, Des Moines, Ia., at present superintendent of the Iowa Anti-Saloon League and president of Iowa Children's Home Society, Des Moines, Ia. The book bears the imprint of The Personal Help Publishing Company, Des Moines. The volume is made up of addresses on "Divorce," "Amusements," "Municipal Misrule," "Corrupt Journalism," "Lynching," "Social Impurity," "Our City Carnival," "Murder—Self and Others," "Gambling," "Intemperance" and "The Civic Conscience," these eleven, but the best of all is the last. The author lives in the twentieth century. He has a keen interest in the things of to-day. Dr. McCash is neither "a mossback" nor "a back number." He is not a growling pessimist. He is full of faith and courage. He believes in God and in men. There is a tone of courage in this earnest book. No one can read even a single address without realizing that the man who speaks is a person of earnest conviction.

I find some things in the book that I do not believe. This feature of the volume commends itself to me. I like to read things that are not in accord with "my views." Such books awaken thought, the result may be a modification of opinions, preferences, convictions. The "Ten Plagues of Modern Life" is a book worth reading. It is a pleasure to speak in this way of Dr. McCash's lectures.

The Greatest Work in the World: or the Mission of Christ's Disciples.

This work, by Charles B. Titus, for seven years a missionary in China, is written from the missionary's point of view. The author has had to deal with sin and unbelief as he found it in pagan lands, and his effort in this book is to show that the claims of what was once called "natural theology" are delusive, and that nothing short of the revelation of God in Christ will answer the demands of the human soul. We do not understand the author to teach that there is nothing to be learned of God in nature, for this would be contrary both to Scripture and to reason; but his contention is that without the revelation which is given in Christ, men are still without a saving knowledge of God, and an adequate revelation of his truth and grace. He points out the fact that the teachings of Confucius do not rise above the ethical, and do not constitute a religion. The author is no doubt right in contending that nature can only teach us its greatest lessons when we have come to know God as revealed in Christ. The object of the work is to emphasize the necessity of sending the Gospel to pagan lands, seeing that there is no substitute for the revelation which is contained in Christ. Price, 20 cents.

My Friend and His Book.

The Christian Publishing Company has published many good books and few poor ones. Some of these have been duly heralded and their merits realized to the ends of the earth; others have had scant praise and have been known only to a select few. A real book out of the brain and heart of a real man is a monument which tells more of the mental and moral characteristics of its author than can be inscribed on any other kind of monument. I have lately read with intense and unflagging interest "Jehovah's War Against False Gods and Other Addresses," by J. M. Atwater. I have only seen a notice or two of its publication. Perhaps more than I know has been said of it; but I can not lay it down without a word in its favor. The first chapter in the book is that which gives title to the volume. It is not a book of sermons, though there is much good preaching in it; it is not a collection of addresses, though in it are addresses of most excellent conception and character; it is not a collection of "sermon outlines," though there are several in it that will bear inspection; it is not a book of biographical details, though the biography in it is longer than the Scripture biography of Enoch. It is rather a book of thoughts, well and clearly expressed, and characteristic of the great mind and heart of its author. For several years at the beginning of the institution at Hiram he was my fellow-student and intimate friend. Our ways parted when we entered into our public life, but our friendship never abated. He was indeed a friend worth having. His public life began in the school room at Solon, Ohio, in 1854. He became a sound scholar, a good teacher, an excellent companion and a true man. In every position to which he was called he was faultlessly faithful in his effort to meet every obligation. He excelled as a teacher rather than as preacher, or as the executive head of a school or college. He was a man of almost infinite detail in his methods of analysis and administration of affairs. To many this made his addresses and sermons tiresome and his administrative directions bewildering. He was an exceedingly busy man, never sparing himself if so he might help others. He once wrote to a friend: "I live in one incessant, pelting hailstorm of demands upon my time." He was a pure man in heart, in speech, in life. He was tenacious in his opinions almost to the border of stubbornness, as some of his friends thought, and was harder to persuade than the occasion seemed to justify, and yet his views were maintained most conscientiously and considerately. His mental forces were strong and he had them under good control, and in goodness he was great; and with these combined he fully merits the rank of a great man. The volume to which I have referred is fairly characteristic of his method as teacher and preacher. While the book was published by his family "In Memoriam" it ought not to be confined in its interest and influence to the family. It is worthy of inspection by all who are interested in the themes discussed and in the methods he used in illustration and in the formation of his judgment. F. M. Green.

People's Forum

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

One of the features of a recent union Sunday-school picnic in one of our suburban parks was an "egg hunt," in which hundreds of boiled eggs were hid upon the grounds, and various prizes, including cash, given to those finding the "lucky" eggs; a large number of children, 10 to 14 years of age, participating. Would you say that this proceeding was calculated to foster in the boys and girls the gambling spirit? W. P. KEELER.

Chicago.

[While these prizes probably differ so generically from gambling receipts as to prevent the tracing of any cause and effect relationship between them, yet, that the question is raised suggests the prudence of applying to all church and Bible school entertainments principles involved in, "Avoid the very appearance of evil"; and, "If eating meat cause my brother to offend I will eat no more meat while the world stands."—S.]

PAYNE.

Georgia A. Payne, born at Spring Creek, Ill., in 1865, died April 27, 1906, at her home, 3078 Perry street, Denver, Colo. She moved with the family, when a child, to Macomb, Ill., where she lived until she was 9 years old, when Columbus, Mo., became her home. Here she united with the Christian Church. She came to Colorado in 1892. For fifteen years she taught school. In this occupation she contracted her mortal disease. She was a true Christian in word and deed. When told that she must die, she said she had no fear. She had suffered intensely for the last two months of the three years of her illness, but was cheerful and resigned.

"We sorrow not as those who have no hope."

SAMUEL COBELL HUMPHREY.

It is due to the memory of this good man and able preacher that more than the simple notice of his death should be given to the public. Samuel C. Humphrey was born in Madison, Ind., November 13, 1832, and died in Akron, Ohio, May 27, 1906. He was buried on the nation's Memorial day, May 30, 1906. The funeral services were conducted from the Broad Street Church of Christ in Akron, over whose congregation he was pastor for the years 1890-1892, by F. M. Green, assisted by I. H. Durfee, George Darsie and A. F. Stahl, pastors of churches of Christ in Akron. If "Memorial days are Love's holy days" nothing could have been more satisfactory to him if he could have chosen the time of his departure, than to begin his journey to "the city that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God" on the Lord's memorial day, and to have his burial service on the day when the funeral notes for a nation's dead were sounding in a myriad graveyards, and over which sweet flowers had fallen, like showers of summer rain.

Samuel was the fifth child in a family of seven children—five sons and two daughters. His father's name was Love S. Humphrey, who was born in 1790, and lived to a good old age. His mother's name was Mary Ramsey who was born in 1798, and lived well into the nineteenth century. When Samuel was 2 years old his parents moved to Petersburg, Ill., where many of his boyhood and manhood years were spent. As Petersburg is not far from the old home of Abraham Lincoln, he became one of the boyhood friends of Lincoln, a friendship which he highly prized, and the memories of which he cherished to the last. His boyhood was spent like thousands of others of his generation, amid surroundings of the days of the pioneers. About 1854 he entered Bethany College as a student, graduating from that institution in 1858, to enter into his public life with Robert Moffett and others who have risen high as preachers of the Gospel of Christ. After his graduation he taught in the public schools of Illinois, and for a time in Abingdon College, and preached as occasion presented until 1861, when he located at Charleston, Ill. This was the beginning of his long ministry of forty-five years. During his ministry he was pastor and preacher at Charleston, Tallula, Petersburg, Little Grove Schoolhouse, Lincoln and Cambridge, in Illinois; Abilene and Celina, Kansas; Tonawanda, N. Y.; East Smithfield, Pa., and Akron, Ohio. He was not a pulpit orator, only so far as clear thinking and earnest and faithful proclamation of the Word are elements of true oratory. As a Scripturian he held a high rank, and his ability to analyze the Scriptures and generalize their teaching was unquestioned. He was a lover of good literature, and a good book to him was a delight. He was a discriminating reader of books, and his judgment was rarely at fault.

February 21, 1861, he was married to Emma Simpson Regnier, at Petersburg, Ill. His wife died May 27, 1876. Just thirty years later, on the same day of the same month he passed into the "great beyond" into which his wife had gone so long ago. At the death of his wife he was left with five children, two daughters and three sons—Mary E., Harry H., C. Victoria, Leroy B. and Samuel C. Jr. To educate and care for these children was the supreme anxiety of his life for several of the succeeding years. June 28, 1893, he was married to Miss Mattie Peckham, of Akron, Ohio. To them was born a daughter, Cornelia M., who, with her mother and the five children by the first marriage, survive him. By his marriage to Miss Peckham he became the brother-in-law of Prof. George A. Peckham, of Hiram College. He closed his active work as a preacher with the congregation at Celina, Kan., preaching only occasionally, and as opportunity offered, up to the time of his death. In 1902 he removed to Akron, which was thereafter his home. Here he lived the quiet life of one whose strenuous labor for more than half a century made rest imperative. He held the love of his brethren until the last, and did what he could among them to build up the house of the Lord.

He was my appreciative friend for more than a quarter of a century. During my service for the American Christian Missionary Society as corresponding secretary I made a tour among the churches of Illinois, near Springfield, and met him in 1878 for the first time, near his old home at Petersburg. Since that time I have known him well, and our fellowship always been in the intimacy of kindred spirits. Though his mental equipment was of a superior character, his natural modesty forbade him "to think of himself more highly than he ought to think," and in the judgment of those who knew him best his appreciation of himself was less than it ought to have been. He had the characteristics of the student and the instincts of the scholar. He took not only what he could find on the surface, but he also dug for the hidden treasure. His sermons were always well prepared and full of "sound meat." His words were well chosen and abounded in wholesome instruction. Some elements which enter into what is called "popular oratory" he did not possess, and hence he did not command the applause of the multitude, as many with far less mental and moral strength do. But he was a good and faithful and successful preacher, and in his long ministry he turned many to righteousness, and I fondly believe he will "shine as the stars forever and ever." His life was well spent and he will be remembered by family and friends and brethren by what he has done.

The Little Farmhouse.

It stands afar midst happy, sunlit fields,
A little farmhouse, brown and old,
With ancient, ivy-covered, buttressed walls,
And straw-thatched roof of gold;
And I a wanderer from the dusty town,
Grown weary of its heavy ways,
Wistful, from off the hot, white road, look down
And long for the old days.

For there the nights were blessed with quiet sleep,
The days were filled with happy cares,
And there the skies seemed ever blue, and there
Was time for peace and prayers;
While youth and laughter, joy and hope, and love
Sang in my heart a happy song.
Ah me! a song that's hushed forevermore,
The crowded streets among.

And now I stand and gaze, with heavy heart,
Across dear fields in longing sore,
To where another woman, happier far,
Looks from the low half-door.
Oh, little farmhouse, old and brown, and sweet,
I wake when all the world's at rest
And think of you, and long for the old peace
And the untroubled breast!

PART III.

CHAPTER II.

As Raymund followed Rhoda from the three-story brick building on Pennsylvania avenue, he was too astounded to find words. That Rhoda, no matter how poor she might be, could have allowed herself to become so unkempt and streaked with coal-soot, was beyond comprehension. How different this was from the meeting he had so often fondly imagined! After three years he met his sister to find her in rags, and wretchedly untidy. He did not believe she was good looking any more, and while that was, of course, to be regretted, it was not so important as her uncleanliness. Dazed by his city experiences and now oppressed by Rhoda's condition, he followed her down the street at a rapid pace. She had said she did not know where they were going; and when she stopped under an electric light and looked at him piteously, he stared back, dumb.

"Oh, it seemed you would never come!" she whispered, drawing a long breath. "Now I think we are safe from the house."

"Do you know any place where we can go?" Raymund faltered.

"How much money have you?"

"Nearly a hundred dollars."

"Goodness!" exclaimed Rhoda. "Let's find a lodging house. You see where that street car track turns? It runs into Thirteenth street. Let's try that. I know there are lots of rooms to let on that street. Don't be afraid; I know the way."

As they passed from the light into heavy gloom—for the street lights were far apart—Rhoda threw her arm about Raymund and said, "I knew you'd come! But if you hadn't, what would have become of me? It's a good thing you came at night; nobody was at home!"

"Ought you to have left the house, then?" inquired Raymund.

"The door locked when I closed it," said Rhoda wearily. "Don't be uneasy about that house. Listen, Raymund; the woman I have worked for, is a shop-lifter!"

"What is that?" inquired Raymund, thrilled by the strange accusation.

"I'll tell you, when we can talk together," said Rhoda. "I'm afraid to speak of it even out here. Listen! Isn't somebody following us?"

Raymund looked about hastily. "A man is standing over yonder on the corner," he said, "but he isn't looking our way."

"Let's us hurry on!" said Rhoda. It was now about 8:30. They tried one of the lodging houses, and were abruptly refused, no doubt on account of Rhoda's disreputable appearance. Undismayed, they tried another, and with the same result. A third failure, however, made them uneasy, and a fourth brought them face to face with despair.

"It won't do," Rhoda whispered, "for us to ask a policeman to help us. We would be taken to a police station, and they would inquire all about it. I can't prove a thing against the woman we've run away from, and it would all fall on me. She might throw everything on me, and I'd be sent to jail!"

Raymund shivered. He suggested, "Why not go to the orphan home?"

"It is full; and they would think I had made up the story against the woman, in order to get back to the home. Anyway, you've helped me; for I remember a lady now, who keeps a lodging house, and I met her at the orphan home. Maybe she will take us in."

They went on for several blocks, and every time they passed an electric arc Raymund stared at Rhoda, saying to himself, "Can this be my sister?" Finally they came to a row of three-story bricks with half-buried basements under the buildings. There was an entrance going down several steps to the basements, and another up several steps to the front door. Rhoda stopped before one of these houses and rang the bell. A middle-aged lady came to the door. The light of the hall streamed over Rhoda and the lady started back. "Mrs. Bannerton," said Rhoda hastily, "my brother and I want to get a room for the night, and I will explain why I am dressed this way, if you will only give me a chance. If you don't take us in, I don't know what we shall do."

"Who are you?" asked the kind-faced lady, peering through her spectacles in the absorbed manner of near-sighted people who are not ashamed to have people see that they are near-sighted.

"You saw me sewing at the orphan home," said Rhoda eagerly, "and we got to talking about different things—the ocean—and I said I had never seen the ocean, and I made you a little poem about sweet violets."

"Why, yes, yes," said the lady. "But you do not look like my little poetess."

"I will look like her when I have decent clothes, and have washed up," said Rhoda, "and my brother, who has come to the city after me, has money enough to buy me what I need."

With the light of the hall full upon Rhoda's face, Raymund saw that in spite of her disreputable appearance, her face was very much as he had known it, only more mature, and unsullied purity looked from her deep blue eyes. He put his arm about her, and said, "I don't know why my sister is in this condition; I found her this way about an hour ago, and we've been trying to get a place to stay all night ever since. I haven't the least doubt she can explain everything—not the least doubt."

Mrs. Bannerton hesitated. Then she said, 'I can not promise you a room, but if you want to you may come with me and explain as you best can. I have never taken any one off the street in your condition—and so young—I have forgotten your name—"

"Rhoda Revore. And this is my brother, Raymund."

"I remember the poem," said Mrs. Bannerton, "and I remember our conversation about the ocean. But you seem so changed—I don't mind your rags and bare feet, so much as your untidiness. As for your brother," she peered at the youth, but his face was so frank and open, and he was so unmistakably from the country that the landlady smiled in spite of herself. She went the length of the hall and led them into a room which proved to be the kitchen and dining room, both in one. "Sit down," she said, kindly, "and let me hear, Rhoda, what you have to say."

Rhoda and Raymund sat down side by side, and Rhoda took Raymund's hand and held it, after drawing her dress forward to hide, if possible, her feet. She looked Mrs. Bannerton in the eyes and said, "At last, when I had thought nobody would ever come for me, and when I knew they wouldn't let me stay much longer at the orphan home—for I am 15 and 6 months—one day there came a woman named Mrs. Van Estry—and offered me a place as servant at $1.50 a week."

"Oh, Rhoda!" exclaimed Raymund.

"I went," said Rhoda. "It was the first chance I had had. I didn't write to Raymund because I knew he would feel bad. But I thought if I liked Mrs. Van Estry, that would be a way of having a home and

An Old and Well-tried Remedy

REGIMENTAL REUNIONS AND FORTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY BATTLE CHICKAMAUGA,

CHATTANOOGA, SEPTEMBER 18-20, 1906.

On September 18, 1906, will occur the forty-third anniversary of the Battle of Chickamauga. It is proposed to celebrate this memorable event with a reunion of the various regiments that participated in this memorable battle and the various battles fought around Chattanooga. This reunion will be held at Chickamauga National Park, September 18, 19 and 20, and the present indications are that it will be the largest and most notabe gathering ever held in the South. On the above dates, the remnants from the armies of twelve states, comprising the following: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Kentucky, will assemble, many for the first and last time since they marched from its blood-stained fields, forty-three years ago.

Here is one of the great opportunities for the education of the youth. Don't fail to take your children and show them historic Chattanooga, with all its historical connections. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Go and see the old war generals and other officers point out the places of interest on the battlefield; let them show you and explain, in person, the markers erected on the battlefield showing the positions of the opposing armies at the time of battle. It will not be long until none will be left to do this noble work.

It will be many years, if ever again, that such an opportunity will present itself. See that your tickets read via the Louisville & Nashville R. R., the Battlefield Route. Call on your nearest railroad agent for rates and advertising matter pertaining to the reunion, or write nearest representative of the Louisville & Nashville R. R.

making myself independent, and I could save, and could keep from ever falling back on Raymund. I want Raymund to go ahead and get an education; that's what mother wanted; but how can he go to college if he has to support me? It makes me miserable when I think that I am just a burden to him. After working on a farm for three years, he tells me he has not quite a hundred dollars. And now I am making him spend even that!"

"Rhoda," said Raymund, staring up, "don't you ever say that again as long as you live!" He looked angry, and his blue eyes blazed; but it wasn't anger that moved him, for he suddenly stooped toward her and drew her from the chair and folded his arms about her. "She's as ragged as a beggar, Mrs. Bannerton," he cried, "but she's Rhoda, just the same!"

Rhoda squeezed him, and went on talking as she stood in Raymund's embrace. "People kept coming to Mrs. Van Estry's, and they looked like bad people. One night everything in the house was stolen, every single thing that could be carried away—all my clothes, my shoes—everything. Mrs. Van Estry seemed so sorry. She said she was poor. She got me this ragged dress, but I had no shoes. I found out afterwards that she had been one of the chief people in the robbery. I found out that there is a second-hand store down town, and she helps to keep it supplied. She is a shop-lifter. She comes home with the richest kind of goods, satins and laces, and sometimes jewelry. She was always telling stories to try to explain how she got them, but I overheard her talking to some of the men. There was one young man who wanted to—to marry me. He never stopped urging it when he was in the house, and he kept looking at me and saying things about how pretty I was, and that made me dress like I am. Mrs. Van Estry was very angry, but I tried to make myself as ugly as possible, and at last the young man left me alone, but I found out from something Mrs. Van Estry said to some other men that he was determined to have me, and he meant to carry me off, some night. He was a dreadful looking young man, and he was often drunk. It was like a terrible nightmare all the time. But I was afraid to accuse Mrs. Van Estry, because I knew they would all band together to show in court that it was I who stole the things. Before I learned the truth, Mrs. Van Estry managed it so that I was often carrying bundles to different places, and now I know it was stolen goods, and could be proved on me. So you see how I am placed. If I go anywhere and tell this story, it will be between me and Mrs. Van Estry, as to which one tells the truth. I am a friendless girl, and she has a great many friends. I haven't a single witness. She has dozens she can make swear falsely. I know that my accusing her would make most people turn against me. All Raymund and I want is a place to stay till he can buy me things and I can look different."

All the time Rhoda had been speaking, Raymund, with his arm about her, had been trembling with indignation and burning with resentment against those who had made his sister's life miserable; and all the time Mrs. Bannerton had been watching the faces of both with her most intent gaze. She now rose and said, "There is a little room in the third story and another in the basement, that are vacant. You can have them at a dollar a week, apiece; they are at the back of the house and quite small. I believe all Rhoda has said, and when she has come from the bathroom no doubt she will look like my little poetess. She shall have one of my old dresses till to-morrow, when Raymund can go and buy what is needed."

Advance Society Letters.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This article is to me, at least, just like a continued story whose ending is unknown. In fact, I don't know how it will turn out. I will explain. You know, of course, that we have invited little orphan Charlie to our house to stay, to visit our Chautauqua and shoo the chicks away. Well, last week came a letter from an old friend of mine, the very Mrs. Bessie Tracy Ryman who with her friends kept our Advance Society orphan a whole month last summer. Perhaps you read about it in this page. Well, Mrs. Ryman invites Charlie to come there again, and right away, and she says that Terrell Marshall, the boy Charlie visited and liked so much last summer, wants him to stay with him, too. They live near each other, but far away from me. If Charlie goes to see them I don't see how we can afford to pay his way down here to Bentonville. Yet, if he comes to see me, his vacation will last only about two weeks, while if he goes to Missouri it will last two months. Besides, if he goes to Missouri, he will get to be with Terrell, his friend of about his own age. That would be more fun for him. I am some older than Charlie, and while I would play marbles or ball with him to help make him have a good time, I don't like harnessing up dogs, and catching lightning bugs, and pulling off grasshoppers' legs, and a thousand other pleasures that make a boy want to be a boy. On the other hand, if Charlie goes to Missouri he won't get to see his little sister whom he hasn't seen for nearly three years. Well, you can see yourself that this is too difficult a problem for me to decide, so I just wrote and told Charlie to choose for himself which trip he would take. I'm looking for his answer this morning, and will not finish this elegant composition until the mail is in.

In the meantime, do you imagine that nobody is keeping our Advance Society rules merely because you are not? On the contrary some of us are determined to read five pages of history and thirty lines of poetry every week; we are steadfast in reading a Bible verse every day; we will not let anybody keep us from memorizing a good quotation from a standard author once a week, and we keep an account of our work in a notebook. Here is our new honor list: Grace Everest, Oklahoma, Okla., sends her fifth quarterly report in the form of a little book, the pages sewed together with threads of blue and old gold, our society colors. One of the quotations she sends is "The Present Hour is Thine," which is true enough, unless company comes. Dorothy M. Brown, Medaryville, Ind., is here with her fifth and sixth reports. Her favorite quotation begins, "Truth Crushed to Earth Will Rise Again." Earl R. Brown comes forward with his fourth report. Flossie Davis has drawn up her eighth report in neat columns. She gives, "Wit is the Salt of Conversation." I suppose that is why so much talk is flat. Ruth Sampsel, Warrensburg, Mo., reports forty-four Bible chapters read in her fifth quarter. Donnie Swift, Billings, Mo., averages twenty-two pages Child's History of England per week. Mrs. F. A. Potts, Chattanooga, Tenn., reaches her twenty-first quarter; her poetry represents 2,202 lines from Whittier. Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo., sends reports twenty-nine and thirty. She reads a Bible chapter each day and is at present digging out a history of education, by Kempis, 128 pages of it to the quarter. I can't help wondering if Charlie will decide to visit me and his sister (which means only two weeks' vacation from hot, smothering, smoky St. Louis), or whether he will select the two months' outing to his friends in Missouri. It is now mail time and my father has gone to see if there is an answer from him that I may tack to the end of this article.

Mrs. Edith Slightam, Spokane, Wash.: "Here's $1 for Drusie Malott and 50c for Charlie. Why don't you go over to the Hands' House and get Houndpup to come and chase those little chicks out if your garden? You have my sympathy. I myself have had some chicken trouble. God bless you all. I will not be hurt if you don't print this. I would rather you would not." (Oh, yes; you are afraid that person whose chickens bothered you will see this and get ruffled. No, sir; I want them to see it: maybe it will cause them to do better.) Mrs. M. F. Little, Mt. Hope, Kan.: "We send you a roll of paper and boxes of Sunday-school cards for our missionary, Drusie. If they can be used we can send others at another time." (The cards sent were excellent—all new. I am waiting to hear from Drusie as to whether or not they are what she needs). Cotulla, Tex.: "I have a little missionary money by me. The children love to tell how they make theirs, but I just worked for mine. I send $1 for Drusie. She has my Christian love for her brave little self in her far-away work for the Master. Please don't give my name." Mrs. W. Burner, La Plata, Argentina, South America: "There is at least one family in South America who is very much interested in the 'Bronze Vase' and the Advance Society. There may be others. We have not found any other members of the Christian Church on this continent, except the Y. M. C. A. secretary, at Sao Paulo, Brazil. Do you wonder we sometimes feel a little as if we were lost? There are other Christians, of course, but very few. The wheels on our carts are as high as a man's head. The theory is, the larger the wheels the easier the cart is pulled through the mud. Argentina mud is as bad as Illinois mud, and you know Illinois roads are the worst in the world. We are doing our best with the language—the children are getting it without effort. The need here oppresses one. We are thankful we came." (Mrs. Burner sends two illustrated postal cards which we greatly appreciate. It cost 15c to send both cards.) South America isn't the only distant country we've heard from this week. Drusie writes from China: "I am taking a few days' rest at our mission farm. This summer is a little harder on me than last. I have been unusually busy the past weeks. I came here yesterday afternoon (May 14) for a little breathing spell; came out in a rickasha, a very light two-wheel vehicle, like a cart or buggy, only it is always drawn by a man instead of a horse." (Don't the men ever get too old to play horse?) "And now about our work: The boys from the boys' school are going home one by one for the summer. How I wish you could see the bright, manly lads and hear them sing! Do you realize how I felt when I heard them sing 'Christ Arose?' Think how you would feel to hear that song from fifty boys who were heathens this time last year! The house on the farm is named Cliff House. It has a wide veranda around it and is on top of a long ridge that 'jumps off' at the back of Cliff House and forms a cliff. How I wish the Advance Society could see this fine view! Little patches of green, grain and vegetables all around, and more clumps of trees than one can easily count; and sheltered within each clump of trees is a little village. Near enough to be seen by the aid of a fieldglass is the Wei River, on which we sometimes get glimpses of little sailboats and houseboats. The birds are singing and the sky is blue. Sometimes there appears a mirage over the river—beautiful scenes of water and trees, or a village. This place makes me feel that I am on the ocean again—the elevation, the wide veranda, the river mist, the islands of green, the blue sky, the bracing but pleasant breezes." I must save the rest of this letter for two weeks. As to Charlie's education fund, I invite advice from all our readers. I will have more to say about this in two weeks. We must educate him, but we haven't enough money to pay his board and tuition six months. Shall we give an ice cream social? How would it do for me to give the social, charging 10c a saucer? Of course, you people couldn't come, but you could send me your 10c and I could eat the ice cream. My father has returned from the post office, and there wasn't a thing in the box except a postal card. But as luck would have it that card is from our orphan Charlie! It comes so conveniently to hand that it almost looks as if it had heard me talking about it! Here is Charlie's solution of the problem that troubled me: "St. Louis, Mo.—I will start from here the 5th, bound for Bentonville. I could not go on both trips, because the Orphan Home can't pay any money for the ticket. I would like to see Terrell, but I believe I would rather be with you, and on the way back see my sister; because I have not seen her for a long time. Tell Mrs. Ryman I thank her very much for inviting me, and would like very much to pay her a visit. Give Felix a gentle stroke for me. Goodby." I do not know if this choice cost Charlie an effort, but I do know that I feel a higher esteem for him on account of his decision. Don't you? So, when you read this, Charlie will doubtless be in Bentonville. This past week I sent Drusie another $5; that made the fifteenth draft the Advance Society has forwarded her. Are you not proud of it? Miss Nana Wood's Sunday-school, of this city, donates 25c for our orphan. I am still thinking about that ice cream idea. I'll tell you what let's do: Let's have a social for Charlie's educational fund, on August 3. The social will be here, and if you can't come (in fact you are not at all expected), send me your 10c. Some of you might get up a little social on that day and send in the combined proceeds. Every one who reads these words or hears about them is invited. Remember, it's August 3; that will be on Friday—just the day for ice cream. You will pour in your dimes. I will go downtown and get me a saucer of ice cream, paying for it, of course. No; now I tell you what: I'll send Charlie a dime and let him get the ice cream. Won't that be a funny social? Who can get up a home social on that day? We will have something more to say about this in two weeks. You see, the idea has just come my way.

: : : GEO. L. SNIVELY : : :

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

Secretary B. L. Smith was wont to say that we Disciples have four frontiers in the United States. For us New England is still beyond the Eastern frontier, though geographically so much nearer Brush Run and other historic cradle lands of this Restoration than the present day center of our power and influence. We do not forget Roxbury, Worcester, Danbury and even Lubec, but they are simply heralds too long isolated from their comrades. It is time for the army of occupation to appear. While planning for Pittsburg in 1909, we ought to look thoughtfully where the sun and the immigrant first touch our shores. We are pleased to present in Brother Aldrich's paper which follows and in other columns of this issue many interesting facts relating to the history and the plea of the Disciples in New England. Bro. J. H. Garrison together with others who are contributing to the meeting Brother Yeuell is holding in Manchester is making an earnest and self-sacrificing effort to establish a church in the only New England State in which we have no congregation. But before 1909 we ought to have a church in every capital and county seat in that rich and populous part of our country. We commend to our readers the practicability of lengthening our cords over this territory, as well as strengthening our stakes there, as one of our pre-centennial enterprises. We suggest a campaign as long as may be necessary at Manchester as the beginning of this new conquest. Communications from our brethren with reference to this enterprise will be helpful and welcomed. Would that some one to whom the Lord has committed enough money would materialize in word and stone in some of New England's flourishing cities Brother Ireland's idea of Centennial Memorial Churches!

Our New England Churches.

BY A. B. ALDRICH.

Any consideration of our churches in New England requires some attention to their history, since their condition is the result of their historical development.

Our movement here is mostly an importation from the British Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

In an early day Alexander Campbell visited Boston and delivered addresses on various topics, but I think no trace of the influence of his visit is to be found in the history of our churches.

In the early decades of the last century there was a widespread movement in New England and the Provinces for the establishment of independent congregations organized according to the Scriptural plan, and for the rejection of human creeds. It was one form of the reaction from extreme Calvinistic theology. It was also to some extent a protest against the condition of low spiritual life that then prevailed in the churches, and took the form of enthusiastic revivalism. Some of the churches that came under this influence went into the Methodist fold, some back into the Baptist, some went to make up the Christian Church or as it is sometimes called the Christian Connection, others were organized as the Free Baptist Church, many went into the various Advent branches and other small denominations while some remained and still remain independent.

I think it is in this movement that we are to find the origin of our oldest churches and of the churches in the Provinces now numbered with our people. It is well known that the strong church at Danbury, Conn., had such an origin. An old record states that the church at River John, Nova Scotia, was planted as early as 1815, when the Campbells were still members of the Baptist Church. Before the middle of the last century we had a flourishing church at Salem, which has long since disappeared. Out of this church came the Worcester church, which in turn has been the mother of most of our present churches.

A church was established in Boston in 1843. It was composed almost entirely of immigrants from the Provinces. Its record, which has happily been recovered, discloses that the paramount idea in that church was the restoration of the ancient order of things. The recorder, after alluding to a church in Baltimore which had three bishops, all engaged in business, thus gave vent to his sentiments: "Yes, hireling clergymen, look and be ashamed. Oh, may the churches of Jesus Christ always retain bishops who are workingmen and then the church will remain pure." This church died and the fact of its existence has only been discovered recently. But it it is a type of most of our churches here in their early years, and of some as they exist to-day. The church at River John was and still is a thorough-going "anti" church, and through the ninety years of its history it has been the prolific source of that blighting influence among our churches. From that church came most of the churches in the Provinces, and they are either distinctly "anti" churches or of the most conservative type of missionary churches. Such has been the principal source of the Disciple movement as it exists in New England.

Our work in New England has, therefore, been handicapped in two ways. First, the churches represented ideas altogether out of sympathy with the progressive and liberal sentiment of New England. Second, they were made up mostly of foreigners who could not possibly come into close touch with the dominant New England element.

The people of the Provinces are splendid people, descendants of common ancestors with the people of New England. The Provinces were settled largely by emigrants from Massachusetts. But common blood and language do not bridge over the chasm caused by allegiance to different governments. A large and discouraging degree of clannishness is inevitable under such conditions, hardly modified at all by the artificial process of naturalization.

Of the two hindrances, however, the extreme conservatism has probably been the most harmful. Many of our churches in New England have died and are scarcely remembered. Quite a number of those still in existence are likely to succumb to the deadening influence of the modified "anti-ism" that has prevailed. For in New England, as probably in the whole country, the thorough-going "anti" spirit is capable of far less harm than the modified form seen in many of our churches.

I am glad to be able to say that some of our churches, and they are prosperous churches, are outgrowing the conservatism of their earlier years, and give promise of coming into such full sympathy with prevailing New England sentiment that they may receive fair attention and consideration and be more attractive to the people.

One other serious hindrance to our work has been the failing of the national missionary boards to attempt serious work in New England. But we are all so familiar with this fact that I will not discuss it at length at this time.

I am inclined to think that the discouragement we feel at times is due in part to the fact that we are expecting more rapid growth than the conditions justify. The matters to which I have alluded make it inevitable that our growth here should be slow. And there are other facts that tend to the same conclusion. First, the growth of our people in the country at large is not as rapid as it once was. In recent years the increase in our numbers in America has been about three and one-half per cent a year, slightly greater than the increase of other large Protestant denominations. Time was when our growth was justly considered phenomenal, but that time has passed. At present I am sure our growth in New England compares favorably with our growth in the country at large.

Second, it is well known that hardly any religious bodies are making any substantial progress in New England. The time of successful revivals here seems to have passed. I have been told of a certain large denomination which in a recent year held a revival meeting in Boston, conducted by two of the largest and most favorably situated churches in the city, and led by two of the ablest evangelists of that denomination in the country. It is said that the meetings cost over $2.000, and the result was two conversions. To any one who has observed recent attempts of the kind in Boston, the story does not seem incredible. If there is something in the times and in this region that causes such unfortunate failures, we can not expect to escape its influence entirely, and we ought not be discouraged if our growth seems to be slow.

This consideration of the history, characteristics, hindrances and reasonable expectations of our work leads to the practical

Current Events

The Rio Janeiro Conference.

Secretary Root has started on a three-months' tour of the South American republics. The first and greatest object of his trip is to attend the Pan-American Congress at Rio Janeiro, beginning July 21. This will be the third gathering of this character, not counting the Panama congress which was held during John Quincy Adams' administration in 1826, and was attended by Henry Clay, then secretary of state. Of these more recent congresses, the first was held in Washington in 1889, at which time the Bureau of American Republics was organized; the second in Mexico City in 1901. Secretary Root's purpose in connection with the present conference is to improve the diplomatic relations between the United States and our southern neighbors. Many of them have, in recent years, conceived an unreasonable hostility toward our government. Most of these Latin-American republics have an inordinate sense of their rights and dignities and a very inadequate conception of their duties and responsibilities as sovereign states. The United States government has been inclined on occasion to remind them of the latter, and this has not made for popularity. Secretary Root's participation in the conference and his visits to the several republics will be part of the general educational process by which we are trying to teach these young republics how to behave as nations in the family of nations. It is both a large and a delicate enterprise, and Mr. Root will have need for all his sagacity and diplomatic acumen.

That was really a great Fourth-of-July speech that Mr. Bryan made in London. It matches up quite well even beside Mr. Roosevelt's address on the same day to his fellow townsmen at Oyster Bay.

The Drogo Doctrine.

One of the most fertile sources of trouble between the South American States and the European governments has been the collection of debts owed by the former to citizens of the latter. If Venezuela owes money to subjects of the Kaiser and refuses to pay the same, the Kaiser sends war ships to blockade the ports of Venezuela until the account is settled. And the modern interpretation of the Monroe doctrine is that we have no ground to interfere with this strenuous process of collection, so long as there is no permanent seizure of territory or other invasion of sovereignty. But while there seems no just ground to stretch the Monroe Doctrine to protect defaulting republics from the just demands of their creditors, there is still apparent justice in the theory which was announced by M. Drogo of Argentine a few years ago. This Drogo Doctrine is that no power should use force to collect the debts of another power to its citizens. Among the first-class powers, this is already established usage. The contrary practice would be far too expensive and dangerous. But the great powers still use force in collecting debts from the small ones. Often there is no other way to do it, for some of these small states, especially the South American republics, exhibit a lamentable failure to take their obligations seriously until war ships appear in port. But then there are citizens in the most enlightened states who do not take their obligations seriously, who put their property in their wives' names and let their creditors whistle. It used to be possible to get at such persons by having them imprisoned for debt, but that has been abolished. The lender now has to take his chances, and in doing so he adjusts the interest to the risk. The war ship method of collecting debts is closely akin to imprisonment for debt. It is applying to a foreign power a degree of compulsion which no civilized state exercises upon its own citizens. The better way—and this is in accordance with the Drogo Doctrine—is for foreign investors to keep their capital out of places where it is notoriously unsafe, or when they do lend money to insolvent or irresponsible governments to make the interest pay for the risk.

Freaks?

One sometimes wonders whether some of the magnificent achievements of engineering and construction which are now under way are in line with legitimate economic demands or are mere freaks of creative enterprise whose chief value is that they will be talked about. There is the Flagler railroad along the Florida Keys to Key West, a marvelous structure, more than half of which will be built on concrete arches in the open sea. There is the "cut-off" built on a vast embankment across Salt Lake in Utah. The Pennsylvania terminals in New York City, now being built at a cost of $30,000,000, will be a great addition to the city and will doubtless draw business for that road, but it will take a lot of new business to pay 5 per cent on that investment. In the building of sky-scrapers, there seems to be no limit. The Singer Sewing Machine Company is erecting a building 593 feet high in New York; and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company (perhaps to get above the winds of scandal) will begin one this fall on the site of Dr. Parkhurst's church on Madison avenue, which will be 700 feet high. The newest and biggest thing in steamships is the new cunarder "Lusitania," recently launched on the Clyde. It is of the new turbine type with four independent propellors turned by engines developing 75,000 horse-power. The vessel is 790 feet long, 88 feet beam, and is expected to jerk 2,000 passengers across the Atlantic in four days. It is impossible not to admire the daring enterprise of those who are making these great investments and even more the skill of the men who are doing the work. But the plain citizen, who does not claim to know much about such matters, wonders whether the building of 700-foot office buildings and $30,000,000 railway terminals is a response to a genuine economic demand or something else.

The National Chairmen.

It is time for Thomas Taggart to retire to very private life. The Democratic party is not in a position to accept the handicap which he gives it by his chairmanship of the national committee. His appointment to that position was a monumental mistake from the first. It was made on the theory that he was a wonderfully astute politician, that he was possessed of an amazing degree of popularity which would swing Indiana into the Democratic column, and (presumably) that he had at least the minimum amount of character which public opinion expects in a national chairman. All of these turned out to be erroneous assumptions. The recent raiding of the gambling resort of which he is proprietor adds the last touch of disqualification for any public service.

Mr. Cortelyou is, according to report, about to send in his long-deferred resignation as chairman of the Republican national committee. He will be succeeded by Harry S. New, the present vice chairman. Mr. New's grandfather was a famous pioneer preacher in the Christian church. His father, the late John C. New, recently deceased, was a graduate of Bethany College and a man of national prominence. Harry S. New is a Butler College man and a member of the Christian Church. His ability as a political organizer on the largest scale is yet to be put to the proof, but his promise is good. If New gets in before Taggart is gotten out, Indianapolis will for a time be the home of both national chairmen.

The advance of civilization in Africa is indicated by a movement, headed by Lord Curzon, for the protection of the game of that continent against hunters. What would Livingstone or Stanley think of that?

Consular Reform.

The reorganization of the consular service, which the recent session of congress authorized, has already been mentioned in these columns. It is not all that Secretary Root desired, but if wisely administered, as it will be under the present regime, it will go far to redeem that branch of the service from the unhappy disrepute into which it had fallen. The consuls are arranged in classes and there will be systematic inspection of their work by five consuls-general at large. All consular fees are to be paid into the public treasury. Consular officers who receive a salary of $1,000 or more will be required to devote their whole time to the work, to the exclusion of any other business or profession. Secretary Root was especially anxious to secure a provision that the higher places in the service should be filled only by the promotion of experienced men. This was too strong doctrine for congress, but the same result was secured by an executive order issued by the President on the day before congress adjourned. Under these new regulations, admission to the lower ranks of the consular service will be based upon the merit system, with thorough examination of applicants and promotions to higher positions will be only for meritorious service. It is particularly specified that no applicant's political connections will either help or hinder his appointment. This will be a sad blow to congressmen who have outstanding promises to their henchmen at home and to that class of political handymen who have been in the habit of taking their pay in consulates. But it will help to raise the consular service from something midway between a graft and a game of chance to a dignified and useful profession.

President Roosevelt has written a letter to the secretary of the Arizona statehood committee, which is in effect an exhortation to the people of Arizona, urging them to accept joint statehood and warning them that if they reject it they will "condemn themselves to an indefinite continuance in a condition of tutelage."

Christian Union: A Historical Study.

IV. THE PROTESTANT ERA; THE PERIOD OF REUNION.

15. When Christ's Prayer for Unity is Fulfilled.

It is not given to mortals to know with certainty the results of events which lie yet in the future. And yet in the light of reason and of revelation we may forecast, with reasonable certainty, some of the results which would follow the fulfillment of our Lord's prayer for the oneness of his followers. We shall undertake, in this concluding article of the present series, to state some of the probable results which would follow the realization of this much to be desired consummation.

1. It would enrich every part of the now divided church by bringing all into the possession of a common inheritance of truth and of historic experience, which belongs to the several parts. No longer would men say, "I am of Luther," or "I am of Calvin," or "I am of Wesley," or "I am of Campbell," but all of us would realize that "all things" are ours, whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas or Luther or Calvin or Wesley or Campbell—all are ours and that we are Christ's and Christ is God's. It is scarcely possible to exaggerate the value of this larger and better equipment which would come from each part of the church sharing in the truth and experience of the whole Church. It would round out, and render more symmetrical, our uneven development, remedy, to a good degree at least, our religious lopsidedness, bring into use a great many neglected texts of Scripture, and give us a feeling of catholicity and breadth of fellowship which would mightily strengthen and quicken the zeal of the entire Church.

2. It would enrich every part of the Church in the wider circle of Christian fellowship and acquaintanceship. How our denominational barriers separate us from each other and make us strangers one to another! How many noble spirits there are in the religious bodies all about us, to come in contact with whom, in Christian fellowship and service, would be an inspiration to our lives! How comforting and strengthening would be the thought that these pure and noble men and women are our brothers and sisters, fighting under the same banner with us and following the same Leader! How sectarianism has impoverished the Church by erecting unauthorized barriers between its members, and thus robbing each part of the intellectual and spiritual wealth which belongs to the entire body!

3. It would give a mighty and irresistible impulse to all the missionary movements of the Church. Freed from the task of building up denominational walls and carrying on a denominational propaganda, the united Church could devote itself, with singleness of aim and with concentrated power and resources, to the evangelization of the world. How our missionaries in foreign lands, and even in the outposts of our own country, would rejoice to know that the Church had healed its divisions and that they were all representatives of a united Church, and could work together as brothers without any sense of competition or denominational jealousy! How much more effective would their message be to the heathen world, if the foreign missionaries could say to pagan peoples, "We all represent the one Church of Jesus Christ on earth, and all we ask of you is to become followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene." No longer would these heathen converts be confused by our denominational titles and tenets, nor discouraged by divisions among Christians the meaning of which they cannot understand. A zeal for world-wide evangelization would sweep over the Church, and men and means would be furnished in abundance to supply the needs of pagan lands. How the heart of Christ would rejoice to see His Church rising at last to a conception of the magnitude and urgency of the great task he has laid upon it! Upon the Church thus awakened and thus undertaking in earnest at last the work which he has committed to it. He would pour out the fullness of his blessing and fulfill his ancient promise in a measure that we now little dream of, "Lo I am with you alway, even to the end of the world."

4. The influence of such a moral miracle as the reunion of a divided Church would be incalculable. It would stop the mouths of infidels and gainsayers. It would set at naught the wisdom of the agnostic. It would silence the scoffer and the religious pessimist. It would remove the chief stumbling-block that is keeping thousands of thoughtful men and women out of the Church. It would prevent that pitiable and pathetic spectacle of divided families—husbands and wives, parents and children, belonging to different churches and separated from each other in the highest and most sacred things of life. It would unite thousands of weak churches, in small towns, now competing with each other, fill the prayer-meeting room with earnest and enthusiastic workers, where now only a few discouraged ones meet to lament the spiritual leanness of the Church, and all departments of the church work would feel the thrill of a new life and new strength.

5. In the new strength, and enthusiasm born of union, the Church would resume its lost leadership in the great moral and social reforms of the times, and undertake, as it has never undertaken before, to heal many of our social ills, care more systematically and wisely for the poor and the needy, devote its attention to the rescue of the submerged part of the population of our great cities, concentrate its forces against the legalized saloon, gambling houses and other demoralizing agencies, lend its influence to the settlement of disputes between labor and capital, put a check upon inordinate greed, and inculcate rational methods of living, safe forms of amusement, wiser methods of punishment, and whatever else relates to the moral and material welfare of the people. No more would it be said to the scandal of the Church that it is so engrossed with its theological dogmas and its ecclesiastical millinery and ritualism, as to be oblivious to the practical needs of suffering and toiling men and women all about them.

6. Engaged in the practical work of helping humanity, the Church would get closer to its Master, formalism would give place to real personal piety, and devotion to human good would absorb the energies erstwhile devoted to theological disputes and denominational strifes. Under this sort of regime the Church would recruit its ranks from a class of people who now stand aloof from its fellowship, and would receive from them the very kind of service which it would need to fit it for its new vocation.

7. The daily press of the world, together with all other forms of literature, would give vastly more attention to religious subjects and to the great enterprises of the Church when once the Church has become a united body, working for the redemption of humanity. Every one knows that it is the spirit of jealousy among different denominations that keeps the press from giving as great publicity to religious gatherings and their actions, as to other kinds of meetings in which all the people are interested. This aid of the press would be a powerful adjunct in carrying forward the interests of the kingdom.

8. Finally, who can doubt for a moment that there would be joy in the presence of God and among the angels of heaven and all celestial intelligences, over the blessed consummation of a united Church? The father-heart of God would thrill with joy to see all his children loving one another and working unitedly together to lift the world to a higher moral and spiritual level. The angels, who, we are told, rejoice "over one sinner that repenteth," so deeply are they interested in human affairs, would sing a new hallelujah chorus over a united Church, making possible the repentance of the whole world. That part of the Church which has "crossed the flood" and is glorified, would join in the general jubilation. How deep and pure would be the joy of these redeemed saints, to see the Church militant close its divided ranks for a concerted movement to bring in the reign of the Church triumphant! We know what joy would thrill the hearts of tens of thousands of devout souls on earth who are praying, with their Master, that our sectarian divisions may be healed, and the Church become one in spirit, faith and obedience, if this splendid victory were achieved. A new note of triumph and optimism would enter into all our sermons, our songs, and our prayers, and we should begin to have here on earth a blessed foretaste of the fellowship of heaven. Surely an achievement that would bring joy to the heart of God, to the angels, and to all the good of earth, is worthy of our labors, our prayers, our sacrifices and our tears. That it will one day be realized, no more admits of doubt, as it seems to us, than the ultimate success of the divine purpose of God in sending Christ into the world. Indeed, these are not separate things, but parts of the same great purpose. He who said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," will fulfill his mission. Blessed are all they who are now working with him for the accomplishment of this sublime end!

Note. Here ends this series of Studies on Christian Union, which has run continuously in these editorial pages for more than six months. It is the Editor's purpose to revise and publish these articles, in a booklet of, perhaps, 100 pages or less, which may later, and in still more condensed form appear, as a part of a larger contemplated work.

Our Reformation in the East.

It has often been a matter of speculation as to what would have been the result had Mr. Campbell and his co-laborers begun the work of their religious reformation in New England instead of in Western Pennsylvania and Virginia. No doubt it would have gained something from having a New England origin, for ideas seem to travel from east to west more rapidly than from west to east. Whether this fact is to be accounted for on the ground that the east has had more ideas worthy of propagation than the west, or whether the west has been more receptive of new ideas than the east, is a question about which the east and west would no doubt differ. Probably there is some truth in both these hypotheses. The east being the older section of the country, has always had the advantage in its educational facilities and, perhaps, its closer contact with the Old World has also given it a certain advantage, and education is a powerful factor in developing the intellectual power and leadership of a people.

There are other reasons, however, which would probably more than offset any advantages which the east may have had over the west as the starting-point of a new religious reformation. No doubt the soil of the great middle west was better prepared for the reception of the seeds of reformation than that of the east; first, because it was less preoccupied and, second, because the religious conditions made more manifest the need of the plea for Christian union—the cardinal feature of the new movement. In any event, there is good reason for believing that there was providential guidance in the place of the origin of the movement. This matter was, no doubt, settled by divine providence rather than by human wisdom. The rapid growth of the reformation has certainly far exceeded all human expectations, but, perhaps, by far the greater and more enduring work accomplished has been in leavening and molding the thought of the religious world.

We are now, however, face to face with a much more practical problem than that suggested above, namely: How can this cause we are pleading be more strongly established in the east? If we have a fraternal and helpful message for the religious world, as well as for the unconverted world, there is no place where it ought to be more cordially received and more highly appreciated than in the east. It is generally claimed that the churches in the east are more liberal in spirit, and less hampered by denominational prejudices, than elsewhere. There is no reason why their catholicity of spirit and breadth of culture should not make them appreciative of, and sympathetic with, a religious movement that has for its general purpose the unification of the divided forces of Christendom, by a return to Christ and his simple and original gospel. Wherever this message has been wisely presented in the east, it has met with hearty appreciation. For obvious reasons our churches have not multiplied as rapidly in that section as elsewhere. One of the chief reasons for this is that we have done far less work there than elsewhere, and another is, the ground has been more fully occupied by older churches.

In view of the fact that we have a message which we believe the religious people of this country should hear, there is nothing contrary to the spirit of utmost fraternity and co-operation, in our seeking to establish representative churches in the east where we may emphasize those truths which we feel need emphasis to-day, and co-operate with our brethren of other religious folds in the furtherance of the kingdom of God. Indeed, if these brethren in the east be as liberal-minded and catholic-spirited as they are reputed to be, there is no reason why they should not co-operate with our evangelists in establishing churches which may afterwards co-operate with them in a very helpful manner in doing the work of God in their respective communities. The motive which underlies the desire to extend the influence of our cause in the east is not sectarian, unless our whole movement be sectarian in spirit and aim, instead of the very opposite.

Why, for instance, should not Brother Yeuell have the sympathy and co-operation of the churches in Manchester, New Hampshire, in the meeting which he is now holding there? If the gospel, as he preaches it and as his brethren would present it, reaches a class of people there which the churches have not reached, or reaches them more effectively, why should not they rejoice in this fact and seek to aid in the establishment of another local church that would be a potent factor with them in saving the people of that city and sounding out the gospel in all the region round about? If all the people of Manchester were already in the churches which now exist, and these churches were adequate for meeting all the religious needs of the people, there would certainly be no excuse for our entering the field; but the conditions are very different from that. And even in the present situation there would be no reason for our entrance into the field, if our entrance meant simply a further division of the religious forces of the city, and the widening of the chasm between the churches, instead of being a unifying force in the community, working for a closer co-operation among Christians.

At the close of a discourse delivered in Boston many years ago by the writer, two intelligent laymen of the Congregational Church tarried till the audience had dispersed, and said to the speaker, "We have waited to greet you personally, and to say that we believe Boston has need for a church standing for the things which you have presented to us to-day." If that is true in Boston, it is no less true in every other city of the east, and it is because we believe that to be true that we are seeking to establish churches of this reformation in such fields in the east as will enable them to bear their testimony to the best advantage in behalf of what we believe to be New Testament Christianity.

Notes and Comments.

A correspondent who commends the general course of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, writes that he does not think the paper has entirely escaped the bonds of legalism. In confirmation of that fact, he refers to a recent editorial comment in which we presented baptism as a command of Jesus Christ which believers should obey. Baptism, he insists, is not a command, nor did Jesus give any commandments. A command, he says, involves legalism, and Christianity is not a legalistic system. Our correspondent is certainly right in saying that Christianity is not a system of legalism, but he is clearly wrong in saying that Christ gave no commandments, and that Christianity involves no obedience to commandments. Jesus said to His disciples, "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." Again He said, "If ye love me ye will keep my commandments." He also said, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another as I have loved you." Faith, repentance, baptism, are all requirements of the gospel which men are expected to obey. A father gives commandments to his children, but the family government is not a system of legalism. Legalism is a system in which justification is sought by the works of law. It is one which excludes the idea of grace. In Christianity "we are saved by grace," but not without such obedience to Christ as it is within our power to render. The spirit of obedience to Christ's commands is that of love. This prevents it from being legalism. We must not make the gospel a license to do our own will. It, too, is a law, but it is "the perfect law of liberty." That is, it is the law of obedience that leads to liberty, for "whom Christ makes free is free indeed."

The New York State Ministerial Association which met at Elmira, June 26, adopted the following resolution which the secretary has communicated to us:

> "Resolved, That in the opinion of this association it is not wise to urge the consideration of the church federation question at our national convention at Buffalo."

The resolution is a little ambiguous, but it probably means that in the judgment of the Association the basis of federation adopted at the New York conference, last fall, should not come up for consideration before the regular convention of the American Christian Missionary Society, to be held in Buffalo next October. If this be the meaning of the resolution, it is in perfect harmony with what we have advised editorially, months ago, provided there was at the time any difference of opinion among the brethren that would likely jeopardize our missionary interests by its discussion. These New York ministers, however, do not indicate, in their resolution, whether, in their judgment, we should ignore entirely this request for action on the part of the Inter-church Conference of New York, or whether we should postpone action until some indefinite future time, or whether there should be a separate, independent convention, not under the auspices of any missionary society, for the purpose of acting on this important proposition looking to a closer unification of the divided forces of Protestantism. Only one thing is clear from the resolution, and that is that a majority of the preachers which met at Elmira in their Ministerial Association, do not wish to have the Convention which is to be held in their state marred by what they fear will be a heated discussion. This could be avoided, however, in two ways, whether the matter was brought before our general convention or an independent body: First, there might be an agreement on both sides to omit all discussion, since the matter has been pretty thoroughly discussed, and let the vote be taken without any speech-making on either side; or, second, by all who are to take part in the discussion agreeing beforehand to be Christian gentlemen, and to behave themselves as such. If there is any doubt as to the practicability of the latter plan being carried out, the former one would be the safer. So far as we are concerned, however, we are perfectly willing to trust our brethren to discuss, in open parliament, any question of vital concern to the interests of the cause, and to trust their sense of justice and fairness, for a wise decision. The situation suggests a problem which confronts us that is much broader than church federation, and with this problem we shall attempt to deal editorially in an early issue of The Christian-Evangelist.

Since the foregoing was written we have received from the Secretary of the Ministerial Association of Oregon a copy of a resolution passed by that body at its recent meeting, as follows:

> "Resolved, That because we are not a legislative body and can not and would not bind any action upon local churches and can, therefore, sustain only an advisory relation upon the question of federation of churches, we recommend that the matter of federation be left to local churches and communities and that we show a spirit of fraternalism and co-operation. We also advise that a committee of three be appointed to report the action of this association to the inter-church committee on federation of churches in Oregon."

If we were inclined to be critical, which we are not, we might ask the brethren of these ministerial associations, how they felt authorized to adopt a resolution relating to church federation, in relation to the national or state convention. We are not denying that they had authority to express their judgment on this or any other question relating to the welfare of the cause, but we would like to point out to them that the National Convention at Buffalo or the Oregon State Missionary Convention, has exactly the same right to express its opinion on this subject as these brethren have. We desire, however, especially to call attention to the logic of this resolution of the Oregon Ministerial Association. It says, "Because we are not a legislative body, and cannot and would not bind any action upon local churches, and can, therefore, sustain only an advisory relation upon the question of federation of churches, we recommend that the matter of federation be left to local churches," etc. Why not then resolve that all action in relation to missionary work, such as the taking of offerings on special days, and all other action taken at our missionary conventions, be left to the local churches, since in these matters no less than on the question of federation, the action is only advisory? The same reason that remands this question to local churches, on the ground that we are not a legislative body would remand every other question voted upon at our conventions, to the local churches. And since the churches have no authority over the individual members, to bind them to any given course of action, why not leave the whole matter to the individual conscience? This is the disintegrating logic of the resolution. The fact that our conventions are not legislative bodies, is no reason whatever why they could not express their judgment and advice on any question, just as the brethren in these ministerial associations have done. There may be good reasons for any convention refusing to express its judgment or advice on any given subject, but that reason cannot be that our conventions are not legislative bodies, since that is an equally good reason for refusing to take any action on any subject. Let us keep clear heads and steady nerves.

Current Religious Thought.

Doubtless the "Central Baptist" will undertake to prove the miraculousness of faith thus acquired, but it truthfully says:

> "A man must believe the New Testament record about Jesus before he can believe in Jesus. It is a poor sort of logic and a poor sort of faith that professes to hold on to Christ while it discredits the truthfulness of that record. It is readily admitted that it is faith in Christ which saves, but faith in Christ is based upon faith in the Scriptures. 'Faith comes by hearing and hearing by the Word of God.'"

The recent legislation consolidating the Presbyterian and Cumberland Presbyterian churches met with the appproval of all friends of Christian union. We note with pleasure in the "Herald and Presbyter" this evidence of its early consummation.

> "In many places the Presbyterian and Cumberland Presbyterian churches are arranging for consolidation in advance of the changes in presbyterial organizations. These churches realize that they are now one and they are trying to get the most possible and the speediest good out of combination. In many communities two weak churches will combine to form a strong one, with regular services and with well-consummated plans for forward evangelistic efforts. A spirit of goodwill is widely prevalent between the people of the two churches. There are some exceptions which we are sorry to note. It is along the lines of least resistance to stir up strife and bitterness in our poor human nature. It is along the ascending lines of divine grace to promote concord, confidence and love. We hope that just so far as is possible all tendency to friction will be suppressed and that we shall hear from the local churches, ministers, elders, and people, as well as from Presbyteries, that the things are being done and the words being spoken that make for peace."

The "United Presbyterian Witness" probably realizing that Christianity is being strengthened by the union movements now in process among Presbyterian bodies, thus intimates that its Methodist brethren might lend a hand, and suggests the way:

> The Gospel of Jesus Christ is the man's religion. It knows no color but white. Whoever embraces it with all his heart becomes white in God's sight at once, whatsoever the color of his skin may be. He is white and clean who is clothed with the white robe of the Redeemer's righteousness. In Christ Jesus there is no distinction of race or nationality. He is the white man who does the will of our Father in heaven and he will sit in one of the seats around the throne of God. We have such distinctions now as the M. E. Church and then the African M. E. Church. Why on this principle should we not say: The Gospel of Jesus Christ for white people, the Gospel of Jesus Christ for black people, the Gospel of Jesus Christ for red men? Jesus Christ did not live in our day and he evidently made no provision for accommodating human prejudice. He just gave one Gospel and organized one church for his whole family and not one is to be excluded from that one communion table who accepts in very deed his one Gospel. Jews and Greeks, Barbarians and Scythians and all are his children and must sit side by side.

How the "fathers" of this Restoration would have rejoiced to hear the "Western Christian Advocate" pleading thus for Christian union.

> According to all signs our English brethren are rapidly approaching union. The Methodist New Connection Conference, just adjourned, has passed a plan for church union that presages similar action on the part of other branches of the Methodist denominational family of that country, and though it may be many years before union is consummated, all signs point to that condition ultimately. We believe that in this respect they are making more rapid strides than we in America, due, perhaps, partially to the fact that their country is small and the people of their churches and congregations more in touch with each other. We are glad to note this trend in Methodism for union. The federation of churches is something more than a mere dream and is fast approaching. When that day comes and denomination after denomination is merged and the religious forces of the world moving forward in related bodies, we trust that our Methodism will be able to look back on the history of the movement and feel that they were not secondary in bringing to pass the glorious consummation.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Alexander Selkirk, in his lonely island, is supposed by some one to have felt in his heart, if he did not actually sing:

"O Solitude, where are the charms
That sages have seen in thy face?
Better dwell in the midst of alarms
Than to reign in this horrible place."

Solitude, long protracted, is not good for man. That was a decision announced away back in Eden. But he who has not learned the charms of solitude, for a brief time at least, at frequent intervals in his busy life, has missed one of the fine arts of living. The charm of the vacation period to the Easy Chair is the opportunity it furnishes for quietness, for repose of mind, and for meditation, and that too in the midst of nature's handiwork. A gentleman and his family came from Chicago to this place the other day, and stopped at the Club House. We saw them sitting one day on the broad veranda with the Lake spread out before them in all its beauty, while they were fanned by the breezes that swept over its bosom, and we thought how much they must be enjoying this scene in contrast with the hubbub and everlasting roar of traffic in Chicago. But we learned the same evening that they complained it was "too quiet" for them here, and that they had passed on hunting a gayer and, perhaps, a more fashionable resort. This shows that people differ in their tastes about summer resorts just as they do about everything else. If one likes either the Coney Island or the Newport style of resort, this is no place for him. But to him who is weary of the conventionalities, the noise, and the rush of city life, and desires for a season to seek the quietness of the woods and the fascination of the great Lake whose companionship is an unceasing source of interest, and where, not in utter solitude, but with a few congenial spirits, he may rest his body, soul and spirit, take his reckonings, and gird himself for new tasks and duties, this place offers superior inducements.

We have established a camp in a grove near the house close by the shore-line, but protected from too strong breezes by the upward slope of the hill, where we stretch our hammock, do most of our literary work, and where, on last Sunday afternoon, we received a company of our friends from Pentwater. This camp serves a most useful purpose just now from the fact that the carpenters are at work completing the cottage, which was only partly built last year. The weather has ben ideal for the past week, and this grove has made an excellent addition to our limited quarters. If these Easy Chair paragraphs should have in them any of the odor of the pines and hemlocks, and something of the freedom and breadth of the great Lake, our readers must charge it up to environment! As we write these lines the carol of a song-bird comes floating to us through the tree-tops, and we hope it is but the prophecy of the coming full choir of feathered songsters that are to make their homes in these groves and entertain us with their minstrelsy. We shall try to form their acquaintance, and live on good terms with them and with the squirrels that build their nests and raise their young in these trees. One of the changes which we have experienced with the passing years is an increasing interest in all living things, and especially in our little brothers and sisters of the woods, whose intelligence and whose feelings the world is coming to understand better now than in former years. We must confess that this love of birds and animals has destroyed very largely our fondness for hunting and is making serious inroads on our enthusiasm in the fine art of angling, as a mere sport. Whereunto this will end we do not know, but we cannot believe it is right to needlessly cause pain to any living creature or to rob it of its life which brings it some measure of joy, for mere sport or entertainment. What is necessary for man's support may properly be taken, with the least possible cruelty or pain, but more than this—well, let every man be his own judge, and be true to his own conscience.

The Pentwater "News" quotes a statement by Dr. Hutchins, who has just returned from a trip through California, and who is now a resident of this beach, that "Pentwater is by nature, the most beautiful resort place, so far as I have seen, on earth." The "News" adds that "the statement is not different from many of those made by visitors who come to Pentwater for the first time, many of whom for the first time actually come in contact with the real beauties of Nature as manifested in the pure air, blue skies, sparkling waters, natural woods, shady retreats, and where there is perfect liberty to enjoy one's self as he pleases. At Pentwater, a half-hour's walk will take you away from humanity, with all its frivolities, into the heart of nature where you can camp at ease and forget that business worries and cares ever existed. And a half hour will bring you back to the village where you can obtain every necessity or luxury of life. * * * When you get out into the hills and woods of Pentwater you are apparently forty miles from nowhere, and yet you are only a few minutes call from the village." "Another desirable feature of Pentwater resort," the "News" adds, "is the high class of people that frequent it. The lawless element common to resorts near large cities is never seen. Among the visitors here are several officials and ex-officials of state, professors of schools and colleges, university students, prominent business men and women, journalists, and others of similar walks of life. All these are men and women of culture and refinement, and are a valuable addition to the local society." We can add our testimony to the high class of people who make this their summer resort. It is sufficiently removed from the large cities to prevent it from being a resort for roughs and rowdies. This feature, together with its natural attractiveness, was a determining factor in our choice of the place for a quiet, restful resort for ourself and such friends as had similar tastes about their outing place for the summer.

There must be some excitement going on somewhere in the brotherhood of which we are not apprised here in our northern resort. We have received a few letters and some resolutions, commented on elsewhere, which indicate a sort of nervousness about our forthcoming National Convention for which we can see no adequate reason. A number of good brethren, not otherwise known to be timid, seem to be apprehensive that something very serious may happen at the Buffalo Convention in relation to the subject of Federation. Away back yonder in midwinter THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST suggested a method which would take this subject entirely out of the Missionary Convention, and we have had no demurrer to that proposition. There is no disposition on the part of any one, so far as we know, to thrust upon the Missionary Convention a subject which the brethren do not wish to consider. We see no reason, therefore, for this nervousness which is driving some of the conventions into inconsistent action. Sometimes up here on the lakeside, when the waves are rolling in, in good shape, while the winds are very quiet, we account for it by saying that there is a storm elsewhere on the lake. We are wondering whether the fierce winds of controversy, blowing upon some remote sections of the brotherhood, are causing this uneasiness. So far as we are concerned, and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST generally, we are anticipating at Buffalo a great, enthusiastic, and harmonious convention. It may be, that these brethren, knowing how fond the Disciples are of a free fight, have adopted this shrewd method of advertising the convention by predicting, or apparently seeking to guard against, a heated federation discussion! We do not wish to interfere with any advertising schemes, but we venture to predict, in the language of pugilistic parlance, that the fight will not be "pulled off" at the time and place indicated!

At very few places in the world does Nature spread a more charming picture than that which spreads itself before us as we dictate these lines. The great Lake is a liquid mirror that reflects the perfect image of the sail boats that glide smoothly and slowly over its waves. In the distance a great white steamer moves serenely on its northern way glistening in the early morning sunlight. Immediately in front of the cottage the scene is enlivened by workmen drawing lumber from the beach by a block and tackle, fastened to one of the trees on the hill, and connecting by one end of a large rope with the lumber below, and by the other end with a team of horses which pulling in one direction draws the lumber in the opposite direction up the steep sand-hill and lands it in front of the cottage. Great invention, this block and tackle. We need something like it in religion to accommodate brethren who have a penchant for pulling in the opposite direction! This ecclesiastical tackle would enable them to pull the load in the right direction even though walking the opposite way. Come to think of it, we believe there is such a divine arrangement, and it works automatically. * * * The number of resorters here has increased since our last, and among them are some St. Louis friends, and others are expected soon. It is a wonder to those of us who are here that everybody doesn't come, but we are very glad they do not—all of them—for that would spoil our now quiet, restful resort. Boats from Chicago are now landing here, making tri-weekly trips.

By F. D. Power

Every one in thinking of Egypt thinks of the pyramids. Along a beautiful road shaded by acacia trees, one may go by carriage from Cairo or by trolley to the Sphinx and the great Pyramid. In the clear atmosphere they seem very near, but they are six miles from the city. What a world of speculation these piles of stone have occasioned! Pyramidology is the word, and "Myths and Marvels," "Miracles of Stone," "Gospel in the Stars" are some of the titles the wise men give their books when they write about them. One of our greatest preachers had a lecture on the Pyramids, for the preparation of which he told me he purchased more than a hundred books. Egypt has more buried people than any land on the globe, and these are tombs of its dead, and that is about all there is to it. The Pyramids of Gizeh are one of five groups in the range of the burial places of ancient Memphis. Herodotus says it took 100,000 men twenty years to build Cheops. So the Pyramid seems to answer two purposes: to give employment to the living and a monument to the dead. Of course, the third purpose, to afford a show place to the nations, never occurred to these worthies. Pyramids are grouped always and are only to be found in the center of the necropolis, as in our modern cemeteries a family lot is marked often by a central shaft and the graves are grouped about it. The tombs of great officials called "Mastabas," and other funeral monuments, are found spread around the pyramid. One of the first things a king seemed to do when he ascended the throne was to build himself a tomb pyramid and a new coating of stone was built around it every year that he reigned. The door was walled after his body had been laid in it, and thus it remained a finished tomb. Different sizes in these structures of different kings can be understood on this theory. I did not climb Cheops. Of what use the wear and tear of clothing, and muscle, and nerves, and patience, simply to say you have done a thing? I did not enter Cheops. Of what use the struggle with dust and dirt, and candle grease, and the smell of dead bats, and the pestiferous cries for "backshish," and contact with unclean Arabs and other living things, to see where once a dead Pharaoh was laid? These monuments are wonderfully impressive. I am quite content to gaze upon them and call up the memories of 6,000 years. On one side the Nile the fertile fields and villages, and the great city; at my feet death, ancient death, the sleeping place of millions; beyond the desert the great sterile, pathless desert. It is a great place to think if you can get away from the quarrels of dragomen and the chaffer of donkey and camel boys, and the nuissance of dealers in "antiques."

There are three Pyramids of Gizeh, all built about 3,700 B. C. Khufu, or Cheops, built the first; Kephren, his successor, the second; Meukaura, the third. Most travelers confine themselves to the great one. The second has some of the outer smooth coating toward the top and is dangerous to climb. The third is easy and so nobody bothers to get to the top. We all want to hitch our wagons to stars. Cheops is 451 feet high and has a length on each side of 750 feet, and covers 13 acres. The second is 447 feet high and 690 feet long. The little one is 204 feet high; and so we pass it with a glance. The great Sphinx, after all, is the object of greatest fascination in this cluster of monuments. Nothing made by man has been the source of so much speculation and confusion of thought. According to the Greek myth the Sphinx was a female monster who propounded the riddle: "A being with four feet, has two feet and three feet, and only one voice; but its feet vary; and when it has most it is weakest." Those who failed to solve the riddle she devoured, and they deserved to be. Oedipus solved it by the answer—"Man," and the Sphinx threw herself from the rock and perished, as many another dealer in conundrums should do. The Egyptian Sphinx is a male deity, with the body of a lion and head of a man. One calls it "the emblem of immobility." That is easy. Another says: "It represents the union of intelligence and power." That is plain also. Still another declares it "the symbol of inorganic nature." That is somewhat confusing and Eddyistic. A fellow in one of the pictures is represented with his ear at the battered lips of the figure listening and asking "What is it?"—a curious Yankee, no doubt. The Sphinx was a solar deity. It symbolizes life; not a dead sun, but the living, rising, benevolent, majestic, everlasting sun, coming each morning out of the east—a symbol of life, of immortality. The Egyptians called it "Hu," and it represents the god, "Harmachis," Horus on the horizon; and while it is the riddle of Egyptologists it really has no secret. This great and noble figure, hewn out of solid rock, is 66 feet high. Between its paws is an altar; and on its breast, a memorial stone of Thothmes IV, 1533 B. C., telling how he freed it from the drifting sands. Below it is a temple built of enormous granite blocks put together in a marvellous way. It was a great privilege to visit these wonders; and turning homeward we drove through the long lane of acacias, meeting by the way the beauty and wealth and fashion of Cairo out for an evening drive under the glow of the setting sun. Time mocks all, but the Pyramids mock time.

Taking the steamer on the Nile and passing through the forest of Giassas, the picturesque Nile boats, we journeyed to Memphis. Memphis was the greatest city in Egypt and of the world, eight miles in diameter; a city that vied with Babylon, that worshiped Apio, that is associated with Menes; the Noph of the Bible, the city of the Pyramids and of Ramses the Great. Here is the hoary "step pyramid," the oldest of these tombs which points back 5,000 years. Memphis lived 5,000 years, according to some authorities, and had an average population of 500,000; and they figure that under its sands sleep 75,000,000 of people. There is little left of the great metropolis. We mounted our donkeys. My donkey boy, Hassan, said: "Good donkey, little, but good; good Hassan; good American gentleman: good backshish!" and every little way he wanted money to buy clover for the donkey. "Donkey very hungry;" and money to buy oranges for himself, "Hassan hungry;" and money for his family, "three ladies" and "four boys!" A Moslem, he had an extensive household.

We rode through beautiful groves of palms and I found "Moses" a sure-footed little beast and Hassan a good driver. We came first to the two colossal statues of Ramses II, one 25 and the other 42 feet in length, that stood at the entrance of the Temple of Ptah. They are massive and of wonderful workmanship, and conform to the figures given by Herodotus. "The Father of History" has sometimes been charged with a wild fancy, but here he was right. Egypt has always held the worship of cats as a high and holy service, and even to-day homeless mouse catchers and roof musicians are tenderly cared for. Herodotus

"FEED UP"

Is the Way to Make Old Men Young.

One of the most remarkable evidences of the power of proper food is found in the following interesting story by a Canadian:

"I am now 71 years of age and have been ailing more or less ever since I was 16 years old, part of the time an invalid suffering with stomach and bowel troubles.

"About two years ago, having learned of the good Grape-Nuts food was doing for some friends of ours, I resolved to try it myself and I immediately found help—more vigor and power of endurance.

"That summer the heat did not affect me as it did before I used Grape-Nuts and after about four months constant use I began to realize what it was to be well and found my bowels adjusting themselves so that I am now free from the old troubles. I had long despaired of such results and can safely say I am enjoying better health today than for many years past, for this wonderful food has literally made a new man of me." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is nothing wonderful about it, only sound, scientific reason that anyone can prove by trial.

The Manchester Meeting

By Herbert Yeuell

Now that I am on the field I can give my impressions of a few days in the largest city of New Hampshire, this busy city of 65,000 population. I may say before writing this article, which is at the request of the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, that while I duly appreciate the honor conferred upon me in being selected for this inexpressibly difficult work, that it was with much fear and trembling, thought and prayer, that I consented to lay aside several tempting offers for promising meetings to take up this work and attempt to put at least one spot indicating a work on New Hampshire's map for the convention at Buffalo.

With this end in view Brother Garrison consulted with Bro. W. J. Wright, whose work in the east stamped him as one of the few men who had done effective work in this conservative section. Mrs. Helen Moses wrote to Bro. A. L. Ward, of Boston, with a view to learning to what extent the C. W. B. M. would be justified in aiding in the support of a church if one could be established. Bro. Ward visited Concord and Manchester and favored Manchester. I copy from his letter to Mrs. Moses:

"Manchester is a city of 65,000 population. Twenty-five thousand of this are not Roman Catholics. About 57 per cent of the population are natives, 42 per cent foreign and about 73 per cent either are foreign born or have foreign parents. There are 20,000 French Catholics and 10,000 Irish. There are about 31,000 young men in the city, but only 765 are church members, and not more than 1,200 attend church. In all Protestant churches, there are about 7,000 members, i. e., 7,000 members out of a Protestant population of 25,000. In all there are 25 churches, including Catholic; 4 Baptist, 4 Congregational, 5 Methodist, 1 Christian Advent, 1 Free Baptist, 1 Unitarian and 1 Christian (connection). Three of these Protestant churches have no pastors. This the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. argues is because of insufficient support. He says there is little or no evangelistic spirit in the churches. He feels that they need us, but said he did not see that we could become self-supporting, as this is the problem all the churches seem to be facing.

After going over this whole matter very carefully, Mr. Hunt and I feel that Manchester is the better place in which to begin the work. I know that this was the decision of the New England board some time ago, but when they made this decision they knew nothing of the real conditions of either city. But I must add, that this is a most difficult field.

Now as to a meeting place in Manchester. We were unable to find a suitable hall. The Y. M. C. A. building is a poor thing, indeed, and looks more like a skating rink than a Y. M. C. A. building. There is no hall in this building. Private halls are very scarce."

At Bro. Garrison's suggestion I visited Concord, Dover, Portsmouth, Nashua, Laconia and Manchester, and while I saw that Manchester was in all probability the most difficult place, yet I felt that as it was by far the most active city that it should be the most strategic point.

However, after several delays, I am here. The only available meeting place is the Park Theater, the best public hall and central, several car lines passing the door. In many respects it is a good place, but in many others not so good, because the best attractions have failed to attract audiences in the town theaters, there being several fine lakes and park resorts with innumerable attractions to be enjoyed for the cost of the street car fare, and the city is practically emptied every night.

A. L. Ward, Boston. One of our ablest New England Preachers.

Having no one on the field who could attend to the previous advertising, I came into the city a comparative stranger last Thursday, and quickly got out some bills and cards, and by the kindness of Mr. Russell Barnes, pension examiner and a member of our home church, Vermont avenue, Washington, D. C., I was favorably introduced to the editors of the two leading papers, who, when they were assured that I would take advertising space in their columns, gave me prominent mention in the Saturday issue. Sunday night brought a very representative audience of about 700. We have been hampered by the Fourth-festivities, having no service on the Fourth. This is the day after, and I am anxiously waiting to see what to-night may bring forth. I am told that the people may attend well on Sunday, but not during the week for any one.

The price of lumber and work, and poor location, and the excess of foreign and rowdy population, put the tabernacle idea out of the question. It will require time to get the ear of New England's best people, and it is better to wait long enough than to cater to an irresponsible element. It may be contended that this is an un-Christian distinction. It would be were this a general evangelistic effort, but with a special work in view we can not be too careful. We are trying to get the ear of New England and through New Englanders to evangelize the foreign element.

Imagine, if you can, a large theater, used only for big occasions, and a call to one of the most conservative towns in New England to attend evangelistic meetings conducted by an unknown man, without prestige, without a friend in the city. Fully $100 have been expended on the first advertising, stamping him as a man with some backing; but whose? In cold curiosity, the evening being too cool for park recreation, 700 people gather to see the show and speculate on the outcome. Brother Hubbard, a splendid young man of Haverhill, Mass., is at the piano on the large stage. Mrs. Susan Brooke Rutherford, of Uniontown, Pa., is soloist and leader. Exactly on time the preacher appears, and

OUTDOOR LIFE

Will Not Offset the Ill Effects of Coffee When One Cannot Digest It.

A farmer says:

"It was not from liquor or tobacco that for ten years or more I suffered from dyspepsia and stomach trouble, they were caused by the use of coffee until I got so bad I had to give up coffee entirely and almost give up eating. There were times when I could eat only boiled milk and bread and when I went to the field to work I had to take some bread and butter along to give me strength.

"I doctored with doctors and took almost everything I could get for my stomach in the way of medicine but if I got any better it only lasted a little while until I was almost a walking skeleton.

"One day I read an ad for Postum and told my wife I would try it, and as to the following facts I will make affidavit before any judge:

"I quit coffee entirely and used Postum in its place. I have regained my health entirely and can eat anything that is cooked to eat. I have increased in weight until now I weigh more than I ever did; I have not taken any medicine for my stomach since I began using Postum. Why, I believe Postum will almost digest an iron wedge.

"My family would stick to coffee at first but they saw the effects it had on me and when they were feeling bad they began to use Postum, one at a time, until now we all use Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days' trial of Postum in place of coffee proves the truth, an easy and pleasant way. "There's a reason."

Bridgeport, Conn., as a Mission Field

By M. L. Streator

Among the New England states Connecticut occupies a prominent place in geography, history, politics and religion. Bridgeport is conspicuous among its manufacturing centers, and has a fair prospect of becoming its largest city. According to the president of the Board of Trade its population has increased 5,000 during the last year, and now numbers 90,000. Within fifty-seven miles of New York City, it is largely under the influence of the chief American metropolis. Many of the business firms of that city have their factories in this one. The population is mixed, embracing many races and nationalities.

Do you inquire, What has been attempted and accomplished? Something has been done in various parts of New England in which I rejoice. Because of its present and urgent needs, let me speak briefly of my own work in Bridgeport. This is the day of small things with us. But do not despise it. God is quietly planting here the seed of divine truth, which has the power of regenerating the soul and the life. Man is but a feeble agent. God alone is great. The power that saves is his own power. He will accomplish his work although we may perish in the attempt to do what he has entrusted to us. All is well if his will be done.

About the end of March, 1905, I was sent by S. M. Hunt, of Springfield, Mass., from Boston to Bridgeport to "size up the situation" and see what might be accomplished. After six weeks of investigation I wrote to Brother Muckley, the corresponding secretary of the Church Extension Board, reporting the condition of affairs and appealing for aid. I told him that if they would help us buy a lot and build a house of worship here the work could succeed, but that otherwise it must fail. He expressed delight in hearing from me, and at once promised that they would help us to the extent of their ability. We made diligent investigation, and selected and purchased a choice lot in a fine location at a cost of $1,100. The Church Extension Board advanced half of this money. We raised the other half, largely among friends outside of Bridgeport.

To succeed in establishing a church in a large city we need to select an unoccupied portion of it. This we have done. Our lot is on the west side, the largest section of the city, in the residence portion, on Maplewood avenue, at the corner of Iranistan avenue. It is within a mile of the center at the City Hall, and yet on the border of a new section that is rapidly building up with good homes. The community is largely native Americans, with a sprinkling of foreigners, nearly all of whom are Scandinavians, people of the same race as the Saxons and the Normans. The Lutherans have a church within four blocks of our lot where the preaching is in the Swedish language. Churches with English preaching are six, seven, eight or more blocks away. We have twenty-five members who are scattered in various parts of the city. The Board of Education granted us the free use of an unoccupied school house opposite our lot till we could erect our own building.

We found it impossible to transfer our Sunday-school from the hall where we had met on the east side to the new place of meeting in the old school house. To gather a new Sunday-school where we had a few members was a serious problem. The Congregationalists had a mission school in the school house, meeting at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. One Sunday evening I found a note from the superintendent awaiting me on the table, requesting me to call and see him the next day at his store, which I did. He congratulated us on our success, stated that they were about to lose four of their best workers by removal, and requested me to furnish them with three teachers and an organist. Their school had been running for eight years. It had been their purpose to build a chapel and to plant a church there. He said, "It is a fine location. But as you have entered the field and are about to buy a lot on which to build, we will not attempt it. The school gradually will come under your influence. When you are ready to go into your new building we will turn it over to you." He told me also that this was in accordance with the official action of the Broad Street Congregational Church, which is one of the best in the city. This proposition, unsolicited, coming unexpectedly in such a gracious manner, and evincing such a Christian spirit moved me to tears. I gratefully accepted it. We had not sufficient officers and teachers to man a Sunday-school. It was a gradually flowing together of two churches in one department of Christian work, where we could work together without the sacrifice of any Christian principle. It has been carried on without any friction. We now have five of the teachers. One of these frequently attends our night services with her husband. She recently said to me, "We like your preaching. You mean every thing you say—some preachers don't—and it is according to the book." The school numbers about ninety. We have had eighty present at one time.

The great task to be accomplished is to raise the means to build the house of worship. Our purpose is to reproduce the building which the Disciples have in Everett, a suburb of Boston. It will cost about $6,000 to do it. I have made repeated appeals to persons of means to build here a memorial church. As yet I have received no favorable response. Possibly some of the readers of this article may be willing to do it. If so, do notify me at once. I am sure the Lord will send you his blessing.

The Church Extension Board have promised us a loan sufficient to cover half of the cost of the building. But they will not furnish the money till the house is built and all debts paid except what their loan will cover. Hence we are under the necessity of raising $3,000 in order to get our church home. As our members here have but little financial strength we must rely on our great brotherhood outside of Bridgeport to supply the means.

My plan is to raise $3,000, or if possible, $4,000. I wish to find ten persons who will give one hundred dollars each. Brother Hunt paid one hundred dollars toward the purchase of the lot, and has promised another hundred for the building. We are but stewards of the manifold blessings of God. Who will join him in making up a thousand dollars? Will you be one of ten to give a hundred dollars?

I wish to find forty persons who will give twenty-five dollars each. Two men in Bridgeport who paid $25 each for the lot have promised $25 apiece for the building. Will you be one of forty to give $25?

I wish to find a hundred persons who will give $10 apiece, and two hundred who will give $5 each. Surely in a membership of 1,125,000 in the United States this ought to be accomplished. Not only individuals, but churches, Sunday-schools and Endeavor societies can aid us in this work, if they will. "A cheerful giver God loves."

It is impossible for us to reach all our members scattered throughout the nation with this appeal. I request that each one reading it will present it to his brethren and sisters, the church, Sunday-school or Endeavor society as he may deem best, or to all of them, if advisable. We need a great co-operative effort for the sake of the Church of Christ in Bridgeport. Being in the employ of the New England Christian Missionary Society, I am responsible to them for every dollar received and disbursed. The American Christian Missionary Society is aiding our New England Board in supporting their evangelists. Help us win New England to the primitive faith. "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, that he himself said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'"

At the conclusion of a sermon on "What think ye of the Christ? whose Son is he?" which I gave in the Temperance Hall of this city, a woman, dressed in black, arose, and with outstretched arm said with emphasis, "That is God's truth, and I don't hear it anywhere else." Do help us to give the people of Bridgeport God's truth concerning Christ and his Sonship.

Precious truth and genuine beauty pervade the gracious words of Whittier, the beloved Quaker poet, in this gem of his concerning the blessedness of giving:

> "All hearts grow warmer in the presence
> Of one who, seeking not his own,
> Gives freely for the love of giving,
> Nor reaps for self the harvest sown."

The Needs of the East

After sixteen years' work here in the east I am convinced that we can not "possess this goodly land" until our people realize the importance of New England as a key to the entire country. The citizens of the east are no more cultured than those of other sections of the land. But there is no portion of our country in greater need of the Gospel of Christ.

New England contains six millions population, or one-fourteenth of our entire population. We have more than seventy cities of over 10,000 each. In all this vast field we have but twenty-one organized churches with about three thousand members.

For many years the east has been the hotbed of new cults; the seat of Unitarian thought; the stronghold of Roman Catholicism; the field of declining faith. Yet our people are migrating by thousands to the West and carrying these conditions wherever they go. For the sake of the safety of the entire country we are duty-bound to put forth our best efforts here in the east.

The foreign population of this section is so vast that our foreign society could spend every dollar of its income right here and yet leave many fields uncultivated.

To-day the swing of the pendulum is away from the higher criticism. The day of investigation has passed and the day of action is upon us. This is the time and here is the place to strike. There is a reaching out after and a longing for the Christ of the New Testament. The plea which we are presenting will put life into the thousands of dead churches. We have towns of 500 population with six protestant churches, averaging only sixty members each. We alone can swing these churches into line and lead them to a common interest. But this work will require time. New England moves slowly. No spasmodic effort will avail. We need substantial aid from A. C. M. S. every year for a long period of years. We need a host of our strongest men—men who are Christian optimists, who will locate in our important centers and stand by the work until it succeeds. We are so few here in New England that the minister locating here buries himself out of sight as completely as does the man who enters central China or the Congo. We need men who are willing to lose themselves for Christ's sake. And our entire brotherhood ought to back the men who are willing to be used of God in planting primitive Christianity in this virgin soil.

To-day we are rejoicing in the prospect of larger things. The A. C. M. S. has promised to aid us this year by the amount of $2,000, or four times more than this society has been putting into this field. But even this depends upon our contributing one-third of this amount directly to the society. This we mean to do, for it will mean larger things for New England.

For the sake of the east I appeal to the brotherhood to sustain the A. C. M. S. An increased May offering will mean greater effort put forth here in New England.

question, how may our churches most effectively carry on our work? It would be presumptuous in me to attempt to answer that qestion in any degree of fullness of detail. But there are some observations bearing more or less directly upon the question which I will offer.

What is the proper work of the church of God? And what relation does it bear to the propagation of what we call "our plea," or the distinctive truths for which we as a people stand? My observation of some other denominations convinces me that their churches cripple their usefulness, and therefore their success, very much because they do not seem to understand the real purpose of the churches, and the place of the doctrines for which they stand. For instance, our Adventist brethren are very devout Christians, but it seems to me that they make a hobby of the doctrines of the advent, which may be true but belief in which is not essential to salvation or to the successful work of the church, and they seem to think the mission of their churches is to preach their conception of the advent rather than to do any other kind of Christian work. And their usefulness and success is hindered by that fact. The same is true of other denominations. In fact the difference betwen the denominations consists not so much in their belief in different doctrines as in their emphasis of different doctrines which they hold in common.

We as a people hold that we have a mission to seek the unification of the divided church of God and to bring Christians back to the primitive Gospel as a means to such unification. That is our plea. But after all is the propagation of such views the primary function of our churches? Brother A. McLean, of the Foreign Missionary Society, says the primary function of the churches is to carry on foreign missions, because the command was given to the church to carry the Gospel to all parts of the world. It seems to me, however, that the work of missions and the propagation of our plea must both be regarded as incidental functions of our churches. The local churches are intended to serve the religious needs of their communities above everything else. The primary function of our churches may not easily be defined, but it is to be found in the local work, by which it helps to make the city and community in which it is located a moral and orderly place in which to live, and meets the spiritual needs of those who come under its influence.

If this view be correct, then, since the way to usefulness is the way to success, our attention should be directed chiefly toward making our churches powers for good in their respective communities. I dare say this has been overlooked too much in the past. We have been so very zealous in the peculiar doctrines for which we stand, that we may have made somewhat of a hobby of them, like some of our religious neighbors. And in doing so we may not have been as careful about the spiritual condition of our churches and our members as we might have been. I am sure that is what many in other churches think of us. The fact is, the most effective work we can do in behalf of our peculiar pleas is that which is done indirectly. In most things indirect influence is more effective than direct influence. If our views and practices are more correct than those of other churches, it ought to be apparent that our churches are more spiritual and have a more potent influence for good on the lives of their members than other churches. Unless we can make that fact apparent it will be difficult to convince others that ours is the better way. And if we can make that fact apparent we will be doing the most effective work for our plea that can be done.

The aim then of our churches should be to so fully meet the needs of the community that observers will say that this part of your city is more orderly and has a better moral tone because of the work of the faithful band worshiping in this church. That is the surest and I think the only way to success. And the result will be that our plea for union and the primitive Gospel will receive a sympathetic hearing.

It is hardly necessary to add that a hearty co-operation with other churches and worthy organizations in all that tends to civic righteousness and personal morality will be essential to success on these lines of activity.

Just how this work of influencing your community for good can be done, is a problem for the workers at each place to solve. It is a work in which every member of the church ought to be glad to engage in some manner or other. But the ones in authority over the church must seek opportunities to do all that can be done, and to give all some work to do. It is very easy for us to drift along thoughtlessly missing our opportunities, both as individuals and as churches. Opportunities must be sought as well as embraced.

for an hour and a half a simple Gospel service proceeds. Gradually the stolid conservatism gives way to intense interest, and soon the audience is singing heartily, and all through the sermon punctuates the speaker's remarks with nod of approval or a smile in relish of a piece of humor in illustration of a point, and at the close crowd to the front to take the preacher's hand to bid him God speed. Four local preachers come forward and wish the meeting success. Even the collection was taken by a Baptist preacher and one of his deacons. Whatever of unresponsiveness may be attributed to New Englanders can not be charged to them in this service. Such was our first, second and third service as regards interest. The attendance at the Monday and Tuesday services was good, although not so large as on Sunday. I was told that New Englanders could not be made to laugh, but these New Englanders laugh right out whenever a humorous point is scored.

Highland Street Church of Christ, Worcester, Mass.

Advertising must be done according to law through the licensed pastor and distributor, consequently this will be a very costly feature of these meetings. It will take so long to develop conditions for the graceful introduction of our plea and its final acceptance that I fear, with this heavy rent and other expenses and proverbially small collections, that Bro. Wright's prediction of $1,000 falls short by $250.

Even with a small nucleus it is difficult to get life into a movement; but with nothing, absolutely nothing, not even a man to take up a collection, you will see how we need your prayers. Pray for New England!

For a Church in New Hampshire.

Already acknowledged	$545 10
W. H. Bates	25 00
Total	$570 10

With great power Herbert Yeuell is preaching "the old Jerusalem Gospel" in Manchester, N. H. At present we have no church in that state and no Disciples have yet been found in that city; $700 or more than have yet been received are necessary to give this able evangelist a fair chance to establish a New Testament church under such circumstances. Will not some of the brethren and sisters at once send contributions for his support? A victory here will mean many new churches before centennial in cities on our four frontiers.

Our Budget

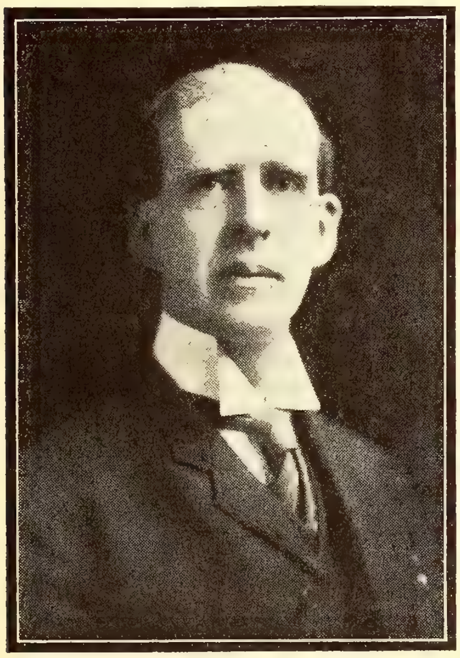
—Our New England issue.

—There is room for and need of 1,000 new Churches of Christ in New England.

—No better place for beginning their institution could be found, after painstaking investigation, than Manchester, N. H.—a state in which we have not a single congregation.

—Herbert Yeuell with all his great powers of evangelism fully enlisted is making an earnest effort to determine for us whether a Church of Christ can be built from the ground up in a New England city where there is not already existing a strong nucleus for the organization of a church. He is entitled to our help. Will not the friends of primitive Chistianity rally to his support by sending contributions to this office for his maintenance while this experiment is given fair trial?

—Few outside the office know how greatly the thousands of readers of The Christian-Evangelist are indebted to Paul Moore, Assistant-Editor, for the good things they enjoy in their favorite paper. Too close application to duty has so impaired Brother Moore's health that physicians and friends have driven him into Yellowstone Park for a two months' recuperation. All who have enjoyed his weekly contributions to this journal will unite with us in our earnest desire that he may at the end of that period return to his post greatly improved.



Paul Moore.

—Read Bro. John S. Stevens' letter in another column. This is also a land and a time of missionary heroism.

—W. L. St. John, who is now at Brownsville, Ore., writes that the children's day apportionment there was five dollars and the collection twelve.

—Brother J. H. Garrison is acting as "summer shepherd" for the little flock at Pentwater, Mich. He preaches to the congregation each Lord's day and will until the minister comes.

—Sister John Hazelwood, of Payson (Ill.) church reports a Children's Day apportionment of $20. but $25 raised. Also two recent additions to the church by confession and baptism.

—James and John Encell recently gave illustrated stereopticon lectures at Marion, Ia., on "Lincoln and His Achievements." The local G. A. R. post adopted resolutions very highly commending the lectures.

—Bro. J. C. B. Stivers and wife, of Cleveland, O., propose to spend next autumn and winter in the south. Any church desiring the services of an able and consecrated husband and wife would do well to write to them.

—J. A. L. Romig has organized several new churches in the British northwest, and has spied out the land so that he knows where to organize a goodly number more. This is one of the most promising mission fields in America.

—Bro. F. F. Guyman, 1620 Walnut street, Toledo, O., proposes entering the field as a singing evangelist in the autumn. Bros. J. O. Shelburne, C. H. Bass, R. A. Omer and C. R. Oakley all commend him as to character and ability.

—Helping maintain Herbert Yeuell at Manchester should not interfere with generous support of M. L. Streator's great undertaking at Bridgeport. Let us go over into New England and help these men of God.

—Our church at Moberly, Mo., has installed a new pipe organ at a cost of $1,800, and the Chillicothe, Mo., brethren have just placed an order for one to cost $2,000. Both of these organs are from the factory of Geo. Kilgen & Son, of this city.

—The brethren in Delta, O., are planning an evangelistic campaign for next autumn and desire the services of a first-class man as evangelist. They also desire a first-class singer. Some evangelistic team doing regular work should apply for this meeting.

—The genial B. B. Tyler has contracted the "Jerusalem habit." He conducts another party to the Holy Land next February. A year in Bible college would not be more helpful than a four months' pilgrimage through Bible lands with this distinctively Bible man.

—Bro. J. S. Raum, of Yale, Mich., has resigned the pastorate of the church at Saginaw, and has entered the field as an evangelist. He has held a number of good meetings, and is well spoken of by those who know him. His terms are $25 per week. He may be addressed at Yale.

—Bro. W. W. Harris, of New Holland, O., has just published a number of brief tracts on "Our Plea," "Two Laws of Pardons," "Honor Bright," "Two Queries," "The Safe Side" and "The Design of Baptism." These sell at 25 cents per hundred and may be obtained from the author.

—Brother James Egbert has closed his ministry at St. Thomas, Ont., expecting to enter Oberlin (O.) Seminary, August 1. A recent St. Thomas evening journal contains an account of a farewell reception given Brother and Sister Egbert and bears witness of their great popularity in that city.

—J. J. Cole has resigned his work at Millersburg, O. The local paper speaks very highly of his ministry and contains commendatory resolutions adopted by the Millersburg Ministerial Association. Brother Cole is open to an engagement with a church affording opportunities for a large work.

—W. H. Harding, of Blue Mound, Ill., is a minister who has come down from "Our Lady of the Snows" with good purpose and the elements of real success. We congratulate this good friend of The Christian-Evangelist over the successful dedication of the beautiful new church home for his people.

—J. G. Shaw, of Francisville, Ind., announces that the second district convention meets at Fountain Park Assembly, August 9 and 10. Special rates at hotels have been secured for delegates. Those intending to attend should write Brother Shaw in advance. An excellent program has been arranged.

—Bro. E. B. Bagby, Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., sends us a copy of an exceedingly interesting program to be rendered at the Bethany Beach (Del.) Assembly from July 29 to August 26. The names of very able speakers appear on the program and all who attend are to be congratulated.

—A recent issue of the Atlanta (Ga.) Journal contains a picture of the First Christian church, now being erected in that city, corner South Prior Street and Trinity Avenue. The paper highly eulogizes Brother H. K. Pendleton, the pastor, as a man of large ideas, lofty aims and very scholarly attainments.

—Bro. W. S. Houchins, in charge of our mission in Montreal, has adopted a novel way of advertising his Sunday meetings. He sends printed postal cards announcing his subjects and various meetings of the church through the mail to a large number of persons. This method is rapidly building up an attendance at all the meetings.

—A new star is rising in the constellation evangelistic. This one is named E. E. Violett. He may be addressed at either 2712 Pine Street, St. Louis, Mo., or Shelbyville, Tenn. Brother Violett's marvelous success as a pastor-evangelist has led him and his friends to believe his opportunities for usefulness will be greatly increased by devoting himself exclusively to this ministry. He has already made a number of engagements, but most churches can well afford to wait a long time for his coming.

E. E. Violett.

—Texas Christian University is to be congratulated on securing Colby D. Hall for its general secretary. The university is now splendidly equipped with buildings, paraphernalia and faculty. Brother Hall will doubtless prove himself a great factor in the educational problems of the Lone Star State. He may be addressed at North Waco, Texas.

—During his continental tour, Hon. W. J. Bryan was invited to a dinner to be given in his honor on the Lord's day. He declined, saying "I am sorry, but this is Sunday and I go to church; won't you go with me?" Here this man who is regarded by most as pre-eminently a politician, has given an example that could be profitably followed by myriads of churchmen.

—J. L. Haddock sends us program of the ninth annual camp meeting of the churches of Christ of Northwest Texas to begin at Benjamin, Texas, August 18, and continuing sixteen days. The preaching will be done principally by Bros. J. L. Haddock and Chalmer McPherson. The place is beautiful for situation, and all will be greatly helped who attend.

—An efficient minister is wanted for a church in southern Missouri, salary $600 or $700 per year. Address L. J. Marshall, 900 South Main Street, Independence, Mo.

—J. F. Grissom has concluded his work at Mulkeytown, Ill., and assumed the pastorate of Bonne Terre (Mo.) church. He will also help some of the neighboring country churches.

—Bro. H. K. Shields, of Rochester, Ind., will soon begin a meeting at Elwood, Ind. He would like to engage evangelistic work in Kentucky and Tennessee. He will be found very helpful.

—From the Daily "News" of Denver, Col., we learn that Jesse B. Haston has accepted a call to the pastorate of the East Side church and that his people are hopeful of great achievements under his leadership.

—Geo. W. Maxwell, of Ute, Iowa, reports the work there greatly prospering. Substantial improvements are being made in the building, helpful additions are coming, and the Sunday-school growth is very gratifying.

—Evangelist S. W. Jackson and wife are in a meeting at Pecos, Tex. The church there wishes to engage a minister. Brother Jackson writes a good strong man will receive a liberal salary and will do well to write J. H. Wilhite immediately.

—Thomas Martin, of California, Pa., has been lecturing on the "Jerusalem Tragedy" in towns near his home. Brother Martin reports a prosperous state of affairs in the California church, and that it will meet all of its missionary apportionments.

—F. G. Tyrrell, formerly pastor of Mt. Cabanne Church, of this city, but now practicing law in Los Angeles, Cal., delivered a "Monologue on Fun" last Monday before the Men's Club of Bro. Jesse T. McKnight's church in Los Angeles.

—Our good friend, Owen Livengood, is supplying the pulpit of the Central, Cincinnati, during the vacation absence of Pastor J. L. Hill. We are pleased to report to Brother Livengood's friends that his health has been fully regained.

—The Charlottesville, Va., Daily "Progress" gives prominence to Bro. C. R. Sines' reconsideration of his resignation as pastor of the Charlottesville church. Great pressure was brought to bear on him to continue with his people and he has decided to do so.

—A witty brother began a paper on "How to Reach the Masses," with this sentence: "There are no masses." So in answer to the question, "Why has there been a slump in our missionary offerings?" we would remark, "There has been no slump." When the returns are all in, this fact will be apparent.

—We are pleased to print elsewhere a communication from Bro. H. C. Kendrick, of Hagerstown, Md. It was a great pleasure to note during a recent visit to Hagerstown the tender love and affection in which this consecrated and gifted man and his equally capable companion are held by the entire membership of that noble church. We hope they will realize all their aspirations before centennial time.

It quiets the nerves, relieves nausea and sick headache and induces refreshing sleep.

—F. L. Moffett, for many years pastor at Centerville, Iowa (Gen. F. N. Drake's home church), has accepted a call to the South Side Church at Springfield, Mo. This change will cost Iowa one of her ablest men, but it is a loss that some of our younger ministers there will quickly supply.

—The handsome catalogues of Christian University are from the presses of the Christian Publishing Company. We are pleased to learn from President Johann that Christian University is entering upon what seems to be the most prosperous era in its history. We earnestly desire this may be more than mere seeming.

—J. M. Settle, of New Franklin, writes that Arthur N. Lindsey recently resigned his work in Howard County but the New Franklin and neighboring churches for which he was working rejected his resignation. During his six years' residence there he has added 1,600 to the churches and built three new church homes.

—G. E. Trone, of Bay Field, Col., says if a Christian minister desires to visit that part of Colorado through the summer and will hold meetings in the Bay Field Church for the freewill offerings and his entertainment, the church will be glad to hear from him. There is no organized body of Disciples in that county.

J. H. O. Smith has resigned from the great church at Valparaiso, Ind., to enter the evangelistic field. He will begin at Jacksonville, Ill., September 1. While Brother Smith's great value as pastor is universally recognized, we believe that even greater success will crown his labors in this special field for which he has demonstrated peculiar fitness.

—A Watts (Cal.) brother writes he will not renew his subscription to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST because of its advocacy to the tithing system which is Judaistic rather than Christian. THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will not plead guilty, but if this brother will convince us he is giving one-half as much as one-tenth of his income to the Lord we will send him the paper gratuitously.

—After a nine years' pastorate at Clinton, Ill., E. A. Gilliland has tendered his resignation, to become effective in the early autumn. The official board voted not to accept it but against the protests of the board and membership generally, Brother Gilliland will soon close his labors there to enter the evangelistic field. He is highly commended to the churches by those whom he has most faithfully served.

—R. C. Ogburn will close his two years' work with the church at Flora, Ill., about August 1. During his pastorate one hundred have been added to the membership, $2,000 paid off on the debt, while the missionary activities of the church have been greater than ever before, and all the organizations strengthened. It is Brother Ogburn's intention to continue in the pastorate either in Illinois or farther east.

—E. D. Anthony, writing of the meeting Pastor R. O. Rogers recently concluded at Fredericktown, Mo., says it is the most helpful meeting held in that part of the state for many years. There were seventy additions; among the number several from the Catholic, Baptist, Episcopalian, Methodist and Presbyterian churches. A new era of Bible study and church enthusiasm and consecrated living has been inaugurated.

—The Indiana Christian Ministerial Association will meet with the Bethany Park Assembly from July 30 to August 1. An exceptionally able program is provided. Among the men from out the state we note that W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, delivers three lectures. The brethren will be greatly benefited who attend. President L. L. Carpenter, of the assembly, is making every possible effort to make the summer session profitable.

—We are pleased to learn of the approaching marriage of Miss Tena Williamson to Frank Allen, of Columbia, Mo. Brother Allen is one of our most useful preachers and well deserves his happy future. Miss Williamson will long be remembered as the extraordinarily successful matron of the Christian Orphan's Home of this city. Lives of long continued happiness and usefulness for them will be the wish of all who read this announcement.

—O. D. Maple, of Marion, O., planned for a revival at Delaware, O. Sectarian opposition has so far delayed the meeting. The opposition was so malignant as to awaken the sympathy of the members of the churches of the opposing preachers for the evangelist, and the probabilities are that the meeting Brother Maple will yet hold there will be fully as successful as if he had not to overcome these seeming barriers to success.

—Thomas J. Shuey has been trying to encourage some of our earnest preachers who are laboring faithfully in smaller parishes neighboring his own. He has visited a number of the churches in the interest of home missions, with more than forty additions as a result. His own work at Abingdon, Ill., goes forward. He is now well along in his third year as pastor and the church has given about $600 each year to benevolences and missions.

—Bro. John M. Alexander, of Cropper, Ky., has gone among the churches in his own and adjoining counties at his own expense in the interest of the American Christian Missionary Society seeking to secure an offering from every church. It is only as the brethren will give time to getting the non-contributing churches into line that any of our missionary organizations can hope for large increases. We thank this good man for the hearty help he has given.

—The First Church at Bloomington, Ill., has extended a unanimous call to Bro. Edgar D. Jones, of the Franklin Circle Church of Cleveland, O. Brother Jones has achieved remarkable success at Cleveland, but on account of an incipient throat trouble, will have to leave that city of raw lake winds. We heartily congratulate our Bloomington brethren. Brother Jones is one of The Christian-Evangelist's ablest contributors, and we wish him well in all his enterprises.

—A debate will be held at Lynchburg, Va., August 20 to 23 between H. J. Farmer, a Seventh Day Adventist, and W. G. Johnson, one of our ministers. Question: "Resolved, That the seventh day is the Sabbath of perpetual obligation." Farmer affirms, Johnson denies. Bro. A. C. Kimball reports that both are very able men and that the church is expecting a profitable time and a glorious triumph for the truth. Visitors will be pleasantly entertained for 50 cents or 75 cents per day.

—Bro. J. L. Thompson, of the Tabernacle Church, and F. J. Burnham, of the Central of Decatur, Ill., have recently organized a mission Bible school in that city, with an initial enrollment of 106. This is in a rapidly growing district of the city, and it is believed that ere long a new church may be established with fine prospects of becoming one of the strongest organizations in Central Illinois. We commend this example to other preachers living in rapidly growing cities.

—We have just learned through a note from Bro. J. T. Boone of the sudden death of Bro. T. H. Blenus, of Jacksonville, Fla. He died suddenly on last Sunday morning. Brother Blenus was pastor of the Church Street Christian Church in that city. It was only recently that we had a very pleasant letter from him from which we made extracts in The Christian-Evangelist. Our Christian sympathies are extended to the bereaved wife and congregation. Further notice will, no doubt, be sent us later.

—The call of the Acting Board of the Amercian Christian Missionary Society to W. J. Wright to become corresponding secretary, will meet with universal approval. The great successes characterizing Brother Wright's various ministries, his Christian integrity, and sanctified progressiveness give him great prestige, and his great abilities as an organizer and propagandist will surely make our home society a greater power in the future even than it has been in the past for the extension of primitive Christianity throughout America.

—Bro. W. H. Bagby, of Missoula, Mont., in a very able article concerning the fluctuation of missionary offerings expresses the opinion that the falling off in the year's receipts for the Home Missionary Society may be readily accounted for without referring it to any discussions in our religious journals. These rising and falling tides are incidents in the history of all missionary societies and are especially liable to follow any high pressure methods of securing funds. He advises more natural and systematic methods of giving as a cure for these reactions.

—Faithful T. M. Kincaid, of Hot Springs, Ark., writes that work on his church is progressing favorably A serious problem now is the support of regular preaching while payments are being made on the new building. Hot Springs is one of the most cosmopolitan cities in the world. There is no more advantageous point for the location of a Church of Christ. Help there is worthily bestowed. He writes further that the prosecuting attorney has eradicated the pool-rooms from the city and it is believed that very soon all forms of gambling will be banished.

—G. K. Berry, of Portland, reports the following lectures recently delivered before his people: Monday evening, "The History and Teaching of the Greek Catholic Church"; Tuesday evening, "The History and Teaching of the Roman Catholic"; Wednesday evening, "The History and Teaching of Martin Luther"; Thursday evening, "The History and Teaching of the Church of England"; Friday evening, "The History and Teaching of John Calvin"; Saturday evening, "The History and Teaching of John Wesley"; Sunday morning, "The History and Teaching of the Baptists"; Sunday evening, "The History and Teaching of the Disciples of Christ." We believe great good will be accomplished by having Brother Berry deliver this course of lectures to all our coast churches.

—George Ringo, writing from Ocean Park, Cal., beside the sun-down sea," earnestly pleads for financial assistance in building a church home for the Disciples in that "Atlantic City of the Pacific Coast." The present opportunity for establishing a Church of Christ there is peculiarly favorable. It is not pre-empted by the denominations, nor is there any existing prejudice against Disciples. The membership in the church has doubled within the past six months, and the attendance at the Bible school has more than doubled in the same time. A local mill has offered to make the pews for cost of material and a Los Angeles firm will glaze the windows without profit. Write Brother Ringo a word of encouragement, backed up with a gift for the new church home.

—George F. Crites, Barnesville, O., is working for six months in West Virginia under the joint support of the A. C. M. S. and the West Virginia state society. His first work is in connection with the statewide simultaneous evangelistic campaign, which will be held next October and November. He is interesting every possible congregation in this movement. He is holding some evangelistic meeetings, has already organized one church, and perhaps by the time this appears will have organized a second. He is securing preachers for the churches needing them and speaking a good word everywhere in behalf of our colleges and missionary enterprises. No man among us has a more important work or in a place which promises greater returns.

—A communication received some time ago from Phil A. Parsons explains some of the difficulties of our cause at Plainfield, N. J. It seems that an old disputed claim against the property of the church, which had been in the courts off and on for ten years, was decided in favor of the claimants for the sum of $3,100 and costs, which made the brethren liable for about $3,600. For several weeks the situation seemed hopeless, but the Board of Church Extension agreeing to make a loan of $2,000, a compromise with the claimants was effected which necessitated the brethren raising only about $600, immediately. In a little over thirty days the money was raised, since which the work has been prospering as never before. Brother Parsons wishes publicly to express gratitude to many friends who have sympathized with our brethren at Plainfield in their trying hours.

—The twentieth anniversary of the Howell Street Church of Christ, at Rochester, N. Y., was an occasion of much rejoicing. This congregation has worshiped in the present building about fifteen years, and at its anniversary enough was made to clear off some $300 indebtedness. There was a suggestion of novelty in the method of raising the money. Three hundred shares of stock at $1 each were issued. These were subscribed for by the church members, Sunday-school classes, etc. William D. Ryan, late of Syracuse, in presenting whom F. Richard Eaton introduced as his "spiritual father," said that there are many people who spend more money in two months on theaters than they do in two years on their church. These seem to regard the church as a sort of peanut stand—a place where only nickels are required.

—Geo. A. Kinley, of Wilkinsburg, Pa., writes that L. N. D. Wells surprised his people July 1 by resigning his pastorate there, to take effect September 1. His work has been very successful and has earned for him a foremost position among the able ministers of Western Pennsylvania. Coming to Wilkinsburg less than five years ago, he found not more than 125 Disciples, a mission church receiving $300 aid yearly from the Western Pennsylvania board, and struggling with a heavy mortgage. In the five years of his pastorate he has received into the fellowship of the Disciples of Christ over 500 laborers for the Master. The church is now self-supporting and the mortgage has been reduced several thousands of dollars; besides his people have contributed splendidly for home and foreign missions, until now the church occupies a commanding position in Western Pennsylvania, and is one of the foremost in Wilkinsburg. Brother Wells has also achieved great success in evangelistic work in Western Pennsylvania and Ohio. He is also a strong Prohibition worker and prominent in Christian Endeavor work, and as a teacher of young men's classes in the Bible school. September 1 he will take up his studies in Columbia University, New York City, and at the same time preach for the Christian Church of East Orange, N. J. His earnest preaching, his kind and sympathetic disposition, his helping hand to those in distress, have awakened the respect and love of all, and his leaving is deeply regretted by his own flock, his fellow ministers, the press and hundreds of his fellow townsmen.

—Bro. T. W. Grafton writes us about an interesting contest which was held during May and June between the Sunday-schools of the Central Christian Church, Anderson, Ind., and the Christian Church at Canton, O. Three points were contested—total attendance, new scholars and collections. It will be seen by the tabulated report that Canton surpassed Anderson by 2,496 in total attendance, while the Anderson Sunday-school collected $13.51 more than Canton, and gained 287 more new scholars, thus making the Anderson school the winner of the contest. We print the figures as one indication of the values of such contests. We shall be glad to hear from Sunday-school superintendents all over the country as to the permanent value not only in point of figures but in what we regard as even more important, namely, the educational and moral standards to a Bible school of these contests.

Nebraska State Convention.

The Nebraska state convention will be held this year at the Bethany Assembly Park, near Lincoln, July 31-August 5. The arrangements are nearing completion and will be the most perfect for the care of the convention goers that we have ever made. Over two thousand were enrolled last year and the indications seem to point to an increase this year. Improvements are making in the grounds and the floor of the tabernacle is being graded. This will make it high and dry and help in the matter of seeing the speakers. It is being painted and the roof stained which will add greatly to its appearance. The dining hall service will be improved as largely as possible.

The program has been carefully arranged and includes some of the great men outside the state, as well as some of the best of our own. W. J. Lhamon will deliver the Bible lectures. Professor Sutton will deliver another series of his splendid missionary addresses. Stephen J. Corey, Geo. B. Ranshaw, R. H. Waggener, Miss Annette Newcomer and I. N. McCash, are among the out-state speakers. State Evangelist Robert F. Whiston will deliver the evangelistic sermons in the evening. They will be short, crisp, full of the old Gospel.

Convention in China.

The annual convention of the Central China Christian Mission was held in Nankin in the last week of May. The attendance was very good indeed, every member of the mission now on the field being present with two exceptions. We feel very much pleased with the results of the meeting. A spirit of harmony prevailed throughout. There was indeed almost perfect unanimity as to the policy to be followed out in the future. We feel now that we have passed the experimental stage in our work. There seems to be no reason now for a repetition of some of the mistakes made by new men in a new mission. Our force has been recently depleted by the invaliding home of some and the furloughs of others of our mission, making it necessary to readjust and change around a considerable, and there has been no little loss as a consequence. There has been, during the last several years, an abnormal demand from home for spreading out on the mission field. We have yielded to this, really against our better judgment and because there seemed to be no other alternative and as a result got ourselves into such a condition of dilution that the unexpected depletions seriously affected us. We have now come to our senses, and I do not think we will do so any more. It will be a great day for the success of mission work, when the church and the society come to realize that the missionaries on the field know more about what should be the policy in practical details of mission work, than it is possible for any one else to know. If there is one policy more disastrous than another on the mission field it is the policy of scatteration. This, I think, we thoroughly understand now, and if we are allowed to order our work accordingly we can promise great results in the future. Miss Dale is at Wuhu alone, owing to the home-going of Brother Arnold, and Chu Cheo is not much better off on account of the furlough of Dr. Osgood and the serious illness of Willie Hunt, which makes it necessary for Brother Hunt to be away from his station most of his time. Dr. Layton will not return to Bodjou because he has no one to go with him, and the mission does not think he should return, and so the depletion has gone on. These disappointments could not have occurred so much to our detriment had we been wiser and located a sufficient number of workers at these places in the first place to enable us to tide over in such emergencies.

We have now decided that we will open no more new stations as centers which are not of sufficient importance to admit of three resident families and that at least two of these families must be on the field and ready to enter these places, before they are occupied. Further we have determined that the field already occupied must be supplied before we push on into new fields. I have mentioned these points because I think the brethren at home ought to know just what is going on and then they will understand better how to account for some things that transpire which they see in the reports of our work.

But in spite of all our mistakes we have much cause for rejoicing and we are in no measure discouraged. The work has gone steadily on. There has been no going back. There has been increase of interest in every department. The spirit of Christian union has obtained foothold with leaps and bounds during the last year, revivals in the churches have deepened the spiritual life of the members of the churches, and we are in most ways stronger and better prepared for a vigorous campaign than we were at the beginning of last year. Our school work is more prosperous than we had reason to hope it would be. The great strides made by the Chinese government in the opening of schools on modern lines, has tended to create an increasing desire for the kind of work we are doing, and there has been a consequent increase in the number of applicants we have received. Our schools are all full and many have been turned away.

The move on foot now to establish a great Christian University in Nankin promises great things for Christian education in China. It is likely known already at home that Christian College has arranged for union with the Presbyterian school in Nanking. The two schools will be united in the coming autumn. Then it is hoped that by the first of the next year the larger scheme will be consummated. It is more than federation, it is actual union in school work. There is no manner of compromise. God is in the movement. Its history will be most interesting reading. As the revival spirit goes abroad, we are able, under the pressure of the great work before us of saving China, to forget our differences and work together for the accomplishment of this great purpose. We have no time to quarrel. If some of our brethren who have so much to say about the cause going back, and sectarianism gaining ground, would come out to this mission field for a time, they would get well of their anxiety. The church may split at home, but we shall unite out here. There will be one Church of Christ in China.

We are greatly disappointed because of the home-going of Professor Paul. We had hoped for great things from him on the mission field, but he thinks he ought to go home, and we bow to the inevitable. There is a great opening for men in the school work, and we need some one right away to take Professor Paul's place. I wish some good man would go to see Professor Paul at Hiram and learn of the need and decide to come out forthwith. I should be glad to correspond with any man who will consider the matter of being a missionary teacher in the new university. Pray for us. F. E. Meigs.

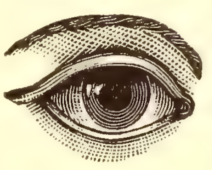
EYEGLASSES NOT NECESSARY

Eyesight can be Strengthened, and Most Forms of Diseased Eyes Cured without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eyeglasses can be dispensed with in the great majority of cases has been proven beyond a doubt by the testimony of hundreds of people who publicly claim that they have been cured by that wonderful little instrument called "Actina." "Actina" also cures Sore and Granulated Lids, Iritis, etc.; also removes Cataracts and Pterygiums without cutting or drugging. Over seventy-five thousand "Actinas" have been sold; therefore it is not an experiment, but an absolute fact. The following letters are but samples of those that are received daily.



Mrs. M. E. Champney, 242 West 135th st., New York City, writes:—"The 'Actina' cured me of Iritis, after the doctors said there was no cure outside an operation. I have been entirely well for over four months, can see to read and sew as well as before. I can honestly recommend 'Actina' for all afflictions of the eye."

Alameda, Cal., March 27th, 1906.
New York & London Electric Ass'n, Kansas City, Missouri.

Gentlemen:—I am more than pleased with the "Actina." When I received it I had been wearing glasses for more than three years for Astigmatism. I immediately discontinued their use and have not had them on since. It is wonderful. I consider it worth its weight in gold. I have recommended it to many of my friends.

Very truly, (Miss) E. F. Tucker,
2041 San Antonio Ave.

E. R. Holbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairfax, Va., writes:—"'Actina' has cured my eyes so that I can do without glasses. I very seldom have headache now, and can study up to eleven o'clock after a hard day's work at the office."

"Actina" can be used by old and young with perfect safety. Every member of the family can use the one "Actina" for any form of disease of the Eye, Ear, Throat or Head. One will last for years, and is always ready for use. "Actina" will be sent on trial postpaid.

If you will send your name and address to the New York & London Electric Association, Dept. 203N, 929 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive absolutely FREE a valuable book—Prof. Wilson's Treatise on Disease.

CHURCH DEDICATIONS.

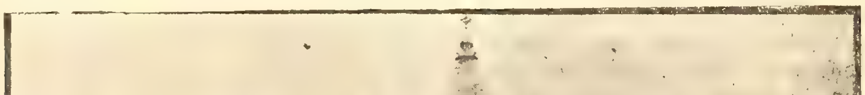
At Blue Mound, Ill.

The church was organized over fifty years ago by Elder Andrew Northcott, who was its first preacher and is one of the oldest organizations in Macon county. The first meetings were in a schoolhouse at Randallville, as Blue Mound was not then laid out. The little band grew stronger in the face of many difficulties and had much to contend with from the stern sectarianism of the time. About thirty years ago the present old building was purchased from the United Brethren and has been in constant use until the dedication of the present beautiful brick structure on July 8. Many eminent preachers and evangelists have preached and held special meetings in the old building and although the church has had many drawbacks and hindrances it has made steady progress and at the present time is in the best condition in its history with good prospects of greater growth and strength. On May 1, 1905, the present minister, W. H. Harding, came to the work at the earnest request of the church, and conditions were such that they seemed to need a level head to lead them. At once the present new building enterprise was started and on July 4, 1905, the cornerstone was laid with Bro. B. L. Smith making the address, and the work has gone steadily forward to completion. The building is of Decatur brick and the accompanying cut will show the design. The interior is finished in oak and natural wood. The auditorium will seat 350 and when all the rooms are thrown into one, the full seating capacity will be about 600. The beautiful cathedral glass windows are rich in their design and in harmony with the rest of the building. A large furnace will heat the different rooms and it is lighted throughout with electricity. The basement extends under the entire building, and when finished it will be used for social purposes. The entire cost of the building was $12,000, and on dedication day $8,000 were called for. Bro. L. L. Carpenter came to us and during the day $7,000 in cash and pledges were secured and the other $1,000 easily provided for.

W. H. Harding, Blue Mound, Ill.

During the day there were visitors from Decatur, Harristown, Taylorville, Mt. Auburn and other places; fully 800 people were packed in the building, the seating capacity of which is only 600. A great victory has been won for the cause of Christ in this community. Brother Carpenter is one of God's noblemen and his visit to Blue Mound will long be remembered.

W. H. Harding.



Christian Church, Blue Mound, Ill.

Bisbee, Ariz.

Last evening, July 3, we had an informal opening of our new church. With drop curtain partitions for two rooms it is an eight-room building. Three of them are for pastor's home, five for church and Sunday-school. By getting some materials from the old high school building across the street we saved about $1,500. We have the best church building in town. It is beautiful to win out, to climb up to the top, get a home, domestic or spiritual; that is what the brethren have done. No debt, no lien; pledges will be all in within six months. Some of our difficulties: carpenters struck, agreed to $4 a day, but must have $5 for nine hours. Then plasterers must have $7 a day! The earthquake raised price of some of the materials for us. Oh, well, why should we complain when it is over?

I start for Southern California with Mrs. Trundle July 5.

Dan Trundle.

[We most heartily congratulate our Bisbee brethren on this triumphant conclusion of their efforts to secure a church home.]

Mahommed Asheroff.

On July 6, 1906, there arrived at the School of the Evangelists a young Arabian having an unusual story to tell. He was born in Beirut, Syria, about twenty-five years ago. His father and mother died when he was 12 years old. He was brought up under the strict and cruel tutelage of Mohammedanism. He was sent to a military training school in Macedonia, and finally became a lieutenant in the Turkish army. He was detailed to escort pilgrims visiting Palestine. In this way he came in contact with many English-speaking people. He speaks English remarkably well. I asked him, "When did you first hear of Jesus?" He answered that he had heard of him for a long time, but it is dangerous to even mention his name in the Turkish army. In the course of time some one gave him a copy of the New Testament in his native tongue. He read until the light began to break. He finally met a traveler named Nichols or Nicholson or Nicoson, who explained the way of salvation to him. Whoever the traveler was, he told the young man the truth. He knows but little, but he knows it straight. He finally asked the traveler where he could go and learn more about the Bible. The traveler drew from his pocket a copy of our catalogue and tore off my address and gave to him, and the young man promptly deserted the army, and with his savings (about $500), started for Kimberlin Heights!

When he got to Liverpool his troubles began. He went to the ticket office of the steamship company; the agent asked him his Christian name. He replied, "I have no Christian name; my name is Mahommed Asheroff, but I want to be a Christian man, agent."

They booked him for passage under the name John Jameson!

In New York the thing grew worse. They wanted to know if he were an anarchist. He did not know what they meant. They asked how many wives he had, and he told them none. Finally he showed them the address, told them he wanted to be a Christian, and they let him land. After many trials he reached his destination.

To-day he heard his first sermon. He even now wishes to be baptized! I believe he is a sincere searcher after the truth.

To us it is remarkable that the little ragged piece of paper so far from Kimberlin Heights, should be his only transport, from darkness to light. It makes us think of the Star of Bethlehem, for it is certain that whatever glory shines from the name on the "transport" it is borrowed from Him whose star it was that guided the wise men to the cradle of the new-born King! He shows a willingness to work. Soon after his arrival he said: "I want to do like the others." He wanted to work. We are gratifying his desire.

Ashley S. Johnson.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Hagerstown, Md.

I began my sixth year as pastor of the First Christian Church of Hagerstown, Sunday, July 8. It may be that some of your readers will be interested in the following brief statement of some things that this good church has accomplished during the five years of my ministry.

Total money contributed for all purposes during the five years, $18,450; total for missions, benevolences, etc., $3,822; average per year for missions, etc., $764.00. The church is entirely out of debt. One hundred and forty have been added to the church. In these five years we placed an elegant pipe organ in the church, put new furnaces in the basement, made most pleasing changes to our auditorium, including a new Brussels carpet; beloved friends presented a fine piano for the lecture room, our Sunday-school room is now undergoing a complete change, and in another week we will have one of the most attractive lecture rooms in the city.

There is a shadow to cast on the bright picture. We have had our sorrows, our sad losses, some, it may be, have departed from the faith, and others have departed to be with the loved ones on the other side. We have our regrets. We regret some things that we have done, but possibly the most saddening thought is due to what we have left undone. "Of all sad words of tongue or pen, the saddest are these, it might have been." This report might be better; we might have done more. Comparing ourselves with others, there are few churches that have so much of brightness and so little of shadow; so little to discourage and so much to encourage. With faith, hope, love and courage we have another year, another five years, if God keeps us so long for his work on earth.

The following are some of our aims. At least 100 added to our church this year. We are now in correspondence with some of our strong evangelists with the view of securing their services in a revival. We seek an average attendance in our Sunday-school of 300; our average now is over 200. Our ambition is to become a Living-Link in both home and foreign missions by our Centennial year, 1909. We hope to have a large number of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELISTS to aid us in the realization of our aims. May the Lord bless this good paper. Every Disciple needs it above all other papers.

H. C. KENDRICK.

He regards that place a fine opening for a school and thinks that our people could do much for that region by establishing one. Nine additions.——D. G. Combs, the tireless, was at work in the counties of Bath, Lewis and Fleming 27 days, added 62, organized a new congregation in Lewis county and thinks a house will be built at once.——C. M. Summers is in Pike county doing his best to get the work at Pikeville well in hand. The outlook is excellent.——Edw. B. Richey has been at South Louisville all the month. Two added. The new house is well on the way to completion—at least it looks as if the house will be ready for dedication in September, prior to the state convention. It is going to be a beauty and one of the best built houses of its class I ever saw.——W. H. Cord is now in a meeting at Cannel City, E. J. Willis doing the preaching. A fine meeting is expected.——The new house at Springville was dedicated during the month. L. L. Carpenter officiated and raised the money needed to pay the debt on the house, $1,200. G. T. Thomason has been helped for six months in his work there and in that section. This closes our agreement to render such help. He had a good meeting in Greenup county, with 34 added.——Jas. E. Thomas has closed his work at Beattyville and started for Australia. There were additions at the last service and he goes to his far-away home with the love and gratitude of the people where he has labored so self sacrificingly and earnestly for the Master's cause. J. S. Mills will succeed him at that point.——T. S. Buckingham is trying to arrange a meeting for Edmont, in Metcalfe county, where he preaches one Sunday per month, and in which work our board has fellowship.——Bromley has the services of H. C. Runyon in a meeting, six added and much other good done. Earl B. Barr regards the meeting as being very helpful.——The Springfield work goes on about as usual and W. P. Walden reports that the expected meeting is deferred until W. J. Cocke can be had to help in the effort to reach the people of that community with the message of the Gospel.——A meeting will be held at Belleview next month where we help to support E. C. Riley for a part of his time.——Wellsburg enjoyed the services of E. T. Wells and two were added by baptism and two by letter. A meeting will be held next month.——S. J. Short added eight in the Big Sandy Valley and visited four places.——The meeting at Jackson closed with ten added by letter or statement and one by confession. Nine officers were selected and are to be ordained soon. A Sunday-school was organized with 28 in attendance and $3.62 collection.——C. A. Van Winkle was at work 28 days in Jackson and Estill counties. Nineteen additions constitute a part of the results of his work. This closes his work in the field and he will take up the Berea work. He wants to go back into the field and raise money for support of his successor.——H. W. Elliott was engaged all the month at home and abroad in the interest of the work. The collections amounted to $384.42—that is gifts from churches and individuals. This pays only about one-half the month's expenses. The board was compelled to borrow money that the men might be paid. We are getting deeper in debt each month. We appeal to the churches that have not made a gift to this work to do so at the earliest possible moment. We urge all friends of the great work we are seeking to do in the needy fields of Kentucky to lend a hand. This is our time of great need. Hundreds of our brethren and sisters can help up in these trying weeks. Gifts of from $1 to $1,000 could be received from our friends if they would give heed to the calls for support of the Gospel work in our own state.

New Zealand Items.

Notwithstanding my being so far removed from the seat of war, I am deeply interested in the very lively tilt some of our papers in the home land are having over the federation movement; and take this opportunity to say that I most heartily endorse both the position taken by THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and the very excellent spirit in which it is defending that position. Brother Garrison's course in this matter must in the end result, not only in great good to the brotherhood, but to the cause of Christian union at large. One of the most amazing things in the controversy is the unkind spirit of passion that some of the opposers of federation have worked themselves into, and that seems to govern them so fully in their writings. Men who are led to such extremes must feel in their own conscience that they have a weak cause. Oh, for a greater measure of that meek and kindly spirit that so fully dominated the Master.

Since commencing this short letter the sad news has been flashed all over the colony that Richard Seddon, the premier of New Zealand, is dead. He died very suddenly on board a steamer, a few hours out from Australia, which was bringing him home from a tour he had been making in that country. Mr. Seddon has been the leader of the liberal government here for the last fifteen years, and was elected a few months ago for another term. He was just 61 years of age. He came up from the ranks of the working men, having at one time labored with his own hands in the mines of this colony.——We have recently had fourteen additions to the church in this city, all by baptism except one. A few weeks ago Evangelist Hamilton and his singer landed in New Zealand from America, and passed on to the south where they were to hold some meetings. I feel that I should not close without saying that I have lately read Brother Garrison's work on the Holy Spirit, and most heartily enjoyed it. I wish it could be read and studied by the whole brotherhood. Our people are greatly lacking in many places in their knowledge of the indwelling of the Spirit.

North Carolina Notes.

After leaving Winston-Salem, Brother Yeuell held a meeting in Madison, N. C., a town about thirty miles from here. There are only about half a dozen Disciples there. He was invited by a Baptist brother to come. The Baptist brother's pastor happened to be holding a meeting at a Baptist church here. He wrote to his parishioner to have nothing to do with that Campbellite evangelist. Likewise, did the doctor of the M. E. Church South, write to his brother minister in Madison, and like Sanballat with Nehemiah, the ministers there wrote to Winston, some of them to the Presbyterian minister who had preached in Frankfort, Ky., and who came to the meetings here and heard Brother Yeuell, and he wrote to Madison that Brother Yeuell was a credited evangelist of his church, and he knew nothing against him. The other preachers who wrote had not heard him preach. The people of Madison, of all denominations there, participated in the meetings. The preachers did not. Brother Yeuell preached about ten days. I was present the last two nights. He preached a number of the sermons preached here. He explained the place of baptism. He did not emphasize immersion, but did combat false doctrines of conversion. I never remember seeing people of all religious bodies in a town, including the Disciples, more unanimous in their appreciation of a preacher's work. They showed it by a generous purse. He left with an urgent invitation to return at another time and hold a meeting, and some of the people said they never wanted to hear their preachers again on account of their actions in turning down a union meeting because held by a Campbellite (?) evangelist. Brethren, don't be alarmed about federation coming here very soon. The greatest opposition to such a move may come from others beside Disciples.

Many of the churches and Bible schools in our state hold union or cooperation meetings over fifth Lord's days. There will be several the last of July.

Dr. J. C. Coggins, president of the new Holman Christian University at Black Mountain, recently was united in marriage to Miss Kate Penn DeVore. Miss DeVore spent some days in Winston last summer, and was much liked by those who met her.

The Middleton church had a good meeting in June, with thirty-one added. Dennis Davis, evangelist. An elder, Ohio Letter.

J. H. Miller has resigned at Ada, Ohio. He has been with this church for some three or four years and has done well. Some church will do well to secure his services.——W. L. VanVoorhis has given up the work at East Toledo. He is in poor health and will spend two or three months on the farm in Licking county. The West Side Church in Dayton has secured a pastor in the person of one of our bachelor preachers, Asa McDaniel, of Zanesville. He will "lay hold" the first of September.——The Alliance Church was not long pastorless after A. B. Moore left. They have called Fred A. Nichols. Brother Nichols has not been preaching regularly for a few years, but we are glad to see him again assume this place.——The Christian Endeavor mission at Clyde will be properly shepherded after July 15 by C. T. Fredenburg, late of Gloversville, N. Y. This is a very hopeful mission, and we look for a new congregation of strength within a short time.——The preachers' retreat at Hiram, August 5-12, promises to be a very interesting and helpful affair. There is no finer place on earth to "rest awhile" than Hiram. The fellowship will be the very finest. The speaking will be from the "best people on earth"—Christian preachers, go to Hiram.——C. J. Tanner, of Detroit, has to come back to Ohio soil each summer for a new supply of inspiration. He is now living at his summer cottage on Lake Erie, at Madison.——Norwalk had a great union revival, under the leadership of Evangelist Williams. He defined sin in plain English and stirred up the natives quite vigorously. Our bishop, J. L. Deming, did not sit back and discuss federation and "cuss" the evangelist for not preaching the whole Gospel, but took off his coat and went to work, and as a result has baptized and churched more people than anybody in town. Whenever you have an opportunity go into a union meeting with a kind heart and a New Testament, and you will get the big end of the results.——Five churches of Painesville are holding union meetings at 4:30 on Sunday afternoon in the park. The city band gives a sacred concert preceeding the sermon. Last Sunday this scribe preached to about 600 people, many of whom never go to church. Try it.—C. A. Freer, Painesville, Ohio.

Ruston, La.

We are in the ninth week of the battle for God in the pioneer city. We still hold our audience and the interest is unabated. We expect to baptize seven more Sunday night. The opposition has been sullen and strong from the start, but we attended to our own business and battled on. We have had no "revival," for we had no church to revive. We started by preaching the first sermon ever preached by one of our men in this city. We have run the meeting on information, not inflammation. We never have had any excitement. You can't run a meeting in this climate on the excitement plan for nine weeks. The rebound will strike you in about the fourth week and kill the meeting. A meeting on information may be continued six months very safely if the preacher has a "barrel" large enough. We ran here at Ruston for six weeks and organized a church of over forty, and called the state convention to meet with us, which it did June 26-29. We had about 100 delegates and entertained them free of charge without a hitch. The convention helped us to $500 on our lot. We now have our lot paid for and are making an effort to build us a house. The way this young church gives to this enterprise is something pathetic. There seems to be no end to what they are willing to do. A sight of our national men and women at the convention, such as George B. Ranshaw, H. F. Davis, of The Christian Publishing Company, A. E. Dubber, Mattie Pounds and Lelia Jordan, along with practically the entire ministerial force of Louisiana, seemed to nerve our young church to do its utmost. Then again, the mails continue to bring in dollars from all over the country. Three small contributions have come from saints of 80 years and older. These remembrances, with the letters that come with them, written with old tremulous hands, fire our hearts to do more and more. We have been a long time getting fifty members, but they are the right kind. May God help us to build a modest brick veneer building on our lot by Christmas. Will keep my postoffice at Ruston for sixty days. Faithfully, but well worn. John A. Stevens, said 700,000 men went to Bubastis yearly and brought dead cats for burial; and this statement has been completely authenticated by the discovery of a cat cemetery there containing innumerable bones of this sacred animal. Now 70,000 Moslems must make the pilgrimage to Mecca, and along goes with the caravan the Father of Cats, or "Shech of Cats," who carries in baskets on either side of his saddle as many cats as he can accommodate; and the great Sultan Bebars bequeathed a garden in Cairo for the entertainment of cats!

As Seen From the Dome.

But Memphis is more than the two Colossi and a mound of ruins where rested the ancient temple. Riding through a native village where ropemakers were at work, and throngs of dirty children cried, "Backshish," and across the fertile plain and through picturesque groves of lofty palms, we came to the desert, and then the great Necropolis of Sakkara, which covers miles and has numerous sepulchral monuments. The Step Pyramid here is the oldest of the Pyramids, so called because it has six steps, or stages, with a combined height of 196 feet. The tombs of Apis, the sacred bulls, form the most magnificent structure of old Memphis. Here the sacred beast of the god Ptah was embalmed and interred with great ceremony. The galleries extend for 1,040 feet, all hewn out of solid rock, and all along the corriders and recesses are the huge sarcophagi of these mummied bulls, the coffins averaging thirteen feet long, seven wide, and eleven in height, and weighing sixty-five tons. Some of the tombs here are beautifully decorated, representing the life of the buried king or priest. He is at his toilet or a banquet; he is receiving gifts or tribute; he is in the chase or overseeing his workmen; he is in his poultry yard or watching his people building ships, or engaged in pastoral labors, caring for his flocks, or his gardens, or playing chess. There are long processions passing before us of men and women with offerings. There are everywhere the sacred boat and the lotus. All these panels are clearly seen and read, after millenniums in the sands.

Riding homeward over the desert and through the green asters and palm groves, McKinley and Roosevelt, Mary Anderson and Moses, Roosevelt and Ramses II, and the rest of the donkeys, made excellent time. Th venerable man from the Wabash, though an orthodox prohibitionist, was soberly mounted on "Whiskey and Soda," and made good time. The trip on the river back to the city was refreshing indeed after our sixteen mile donkey ride in a broiling sun. The Nile is rich in scenery. The women filling their water jugs at its banks, the shadoof lifting the water for the irrigating ditches with the old-fashioned well-sweep, worked by the fellaheen at ten or twenty cents a day wages; the sakiyeh with its endless chain of earthen jars connected with a toothed upright wheel and turned by a horizontal wheel lifting the water, and run by a bullock or camel or donkey blindfolded to keep off the flies and impress the animal with the idea that he is moving straight ahead instead of in a circle; the picturesque Nile boats; the palms with tall and slender trunks and lofty, bushy crowns, clusters of blossoms hanging under the long leaves which change by and by to clusters of dates; gardens with oranges, lemons and figs, and fields of rich green, with peasants at work and animals feeding; and beyond, the brown hills and the fiery desert; villages as primitive as a thousand years ago, and the gay and beautiful city in the distance—all go to make up a charming picture. It was an experience long to be remembered—the day in Sakkara—the evening on the Nile. The camel says, There are three: the Pyramid, the date palm, and myself. Go to!

Rising Tide of Spiritual Interest.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Let us grant, men do receive the Holy Spirit according to the terms of salvation laid down by Peter (Acts 2:38); but may we not by earnest and frequent prayer enjoy in a fuller measure the divine benedictions, and glorious revelations of God's power and love, which it is expressly his office to perform, constantly and increasingly?

As for me, I have sustained far graver fears of grieving the holy spirit of God through harsh, unjust and inflexible demands for absolute orthodoxy along these lines, than I have ever realized through humble and earnest prayer for a positive and real increase of the measure of the fulness of the spirit of God. It seems to me almost sacriligious to handle so lightly and hold so peremptorily that concerning which Jesus said God holds so sacred as to grant forgiveness to none who are guilty of blasphemy regarding it.

I suppose if any can be found who received at the time they complied with the terms of salvation an infilling of the Holy Spirit, so complete and abiding, they have never been conscious of lack in meeting the duties of life, they could not be reasonably expected to recognize the intense yearning for a deeper and wider manifestation. I did not so find it. I have found verified the promise, "Blessed is he that hungereth and thirsteth." Not once, but many times, have I been driven to ask for a greater "anointing" by the overwhelming conviction that in this alone depended my strength for service. And in faith I have plead the declaration of Christ, "If we being evil know how to give good gifts, shall not our Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him," and through believing this very positive declaration I have received.

I rejoice to see the tide rising among us of giving or rather acknowledging the place and purpose of the Holy Spirit as an essential in every Christian life.

Valparaiso, Neb. J. E. Chase.

"The Cause" in Missouri.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

It has been cause for humiliation for a dozen or more years that from 1,200 to 1,800 churches have been reported—and from 150,000 to 180,000 members claimed, while the conventions all told have numbered less than half a thousand, and the entire fund coming through the co-operation for state work has amounted to $5,000 to $8,000 or less. It is not claimed that these figures are absolutely correct, but they are approximately so.

Many have felt that the figures were certainly exaggerated, or else the means employed to secure the co-operation of the churches have been woefully inefficient.

It is therefore a source of gratification to read the report of the recent convention; and yet it appears from the thinning out as the convention progressed the state convention of the churches was by far the least important of the interests which brought the preachers and the people together. It would be interesting to know how many of the thousand persons present were delegates from the churches, bearing certificates of appointment, and clothed with authority to speak for the churches and especially to vote for them.

There is, of course, no way to ascertain this information, since for years the so-called conventions have been simply mass meetings. One delegate from each church in the state would make a larger convention that has ever been held. The churches would then be committed to the work planned by the convention and larger results would come with far less labor to the secretary.

Would it not be worth a year's work to secure this result? It can be done if the proper effort be made. Even if it shall require a half dozen years. All the interests of the church could in such case be adequately considered by the churches, and preachers and people would find co-operation easy—and the results satisfactory. It is, therefore, moved that at the next convention every member be required to present his credentials.

Kansas City. T. P. Haley.

A Timely Issue.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

I have been more profoundly interested in the late discussion of the question of Federation in our papers than in the discussion of any religious question for a long time. The issue and its discussion by our people is not only timely, but will form an important historic period in the current reformation. It constitutes a necessary and natural development of our history and the aims and desires of the fathers and founders of the greatest movement of the age, back to apostolic teaching and practice. It is incredible that we could accept or indorse every union movement that may be formulated and introduced by the denominations; but it is equally incredible that we should hesitate to hail with pleasure such movements or to seriously discuss the same. I have had no uneasiness as to the ultimate results of this discussion. No earthly power can stay the progress of a movement which has challenged the world to produce its equal or to paralyze the hand and invisible power behind it. Let no man, be he editor, preacher, writer or what not, regard himself able to turn the course of a religious reformation that is surely and grandly pushing its way throughout the world. Out of the million and more men and women forming the membership of the Christian Church, no living man could draw away more than a few thousand into the wilderness as in days of yore, and this would not make a ripple upon the great stream that is coursing its way around the world. THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST may have made some mistakes, and surely it would have been more than human had it not, under the unprecedented strain through which it has gone. But THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST may seek consolation in the fact that it has opened to the world a medium of communication for the discussion of one of the most important questions since the days of the fathers. It has also contributed far more to the growth of Christian union and free and dignified discussion of religious subjects than any paper could possibly accomplish, by an uncompromising and sometimes unintelligible opposition to the discussion of a grave and vitally important question. I have been a silent, but deeply interested, reader of all sides of this question, and pencil these lines out of purest motives and to say to my brethren that I can not conceive it possible for any harm to come from federation, or anything else that we can encourage without any violation of our religious conceptions. May God be with you and many subscriptions added to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and a glorious celebration mark the close of our first century.

Expenses unavoidably frightful, costs city prices to even get tickets distributed; require long campaign. Bad time account people leaving for mountains.—Herbert Yeuell.

Arkansas.

Bentonville, July 26.—Two additions to the church, Sunday, 24.—T. W. Ellis.

California.

Winters, July 9.—There were recently six additions by baptism.—G. A. Ragan.

Idaho.

Rupert, July 11.—I commenced a meeting here last night with four added, two by letter and two by statement. This is a new town a little over a year old, with no church building, but six saloons. The Methodists have an organization of probably twenty-five or thirty. We have one of eighteen. Expect to have a good meeting and leave a church of between fifty and one hundred. The Bible school has an attendance of fifty or sixty and the Christian Endeavor has twenty-eight members. I expected to begin at Nampa July 6, but the new tabernacle for the meeting was not finished, so I preached in it as it was Lord's day morning and evening, with three additions. Final result at Meridian, church of 63, Bible school of 45 and Christian Endeavor 25. Lots purchased, pastor called for one-half time and good building committee appointed to begin work at once.—Geo. C. Ritchey.

Illinois.

Sullivan, July 8.—Four additions at regular services to-day. Baptized twelve to-night. Exchanged pulpits with Brother Lyon, of Newman, Ill., last Sunday.—J. G. McNutt.

Albion (West Village) July 9.—Two united with us by letter yesterday. Foreign missionary offering, $40.—J. F. King.

Eureka, July 9.—One by confession yesterday at Emden, Ill.—C. A. Sittser.

Roseville, July 10.—Four confessions here last Lord's day morning at the regular services. I am now entering my second year with the church here. During the year just closed the church received 29 additions, the majority were by confession and baptism. One hundred and sixty dollars were give for missionary purposes. The outlook is good.—C. R. Wo..ord.

Waverly, July 10.—We have been here six months. Have added to the church by commendation eight, and by baptism eleven, and others are expected. The church co-operated with the other churches in the city in a union tent meeting, and I think we gained much by this little spell of "confederation." An excellent feeling exists among the people, a good trend of morals in civic government is set in motion so that the "lid is on the joints and slot machines." I do not think we sacrifice a single principle that our fathers fought for, and we gained a reputation of favorableness not had before. Since we came here we have preached the baccalaureate and memorial sermons.—J. A. Clemens.

Indiana.

Hammond, July 11.—Two confessions at Hammond Sunday and one at Whiting. We recently held a tent meeting at Hammond. The pastor did the preaching and Miss Mary Bailey of Angola sang for us. Audiences large, reaching nearly 1,000. Results of meeting, six by letter; thirty-six confessions.—C. J. Sharp.

Plainfield, July 1.—There were five confessions and baptisms at the morning service. We are planning for a great meeting in October.—I. N. Grisso.

Eaton, July 10.—T. L. Lawrence, living link evangelist of the Christian Publishing Company, on Sunday morning, July 8, filled the pulpit here very acceptably.—L. O. Newcomer.

Indianapolis, July 10.—Six additions to the Olive Branch Christian Church, of this city, recently. Two by letter, four by confession and baptism.—J. M. Canfield.

Ligonier, July 9.—Since last report there have been nine additions to the church here; seven by primary obedience and two by commendation.—I. N. Aldrich.

Indian Territory.

Okmulgee, July 10.—Accessions the last three Lord's days: letters seven, confessions sixteen, from M. E. one. More to follow. This makes forty-five since beginning of year. All but twelve at regular services. One hundred and forty-two since the beginning of the present ministration. Brother Hawkins, our corresponding secretary, was with us last Lord's day. We were all delighted to have him with us. We made an offering of $76.80 to territorial work. We are entering into greater things. I have been granted a vacation of thirty days. I will enter upon it in a short time, but as yet don't know where or how. I am indeed grateful for this much needed rest.—Frank L. Van Voorhis.

Iowa.

Riverton, July 15.—We are building a new church here. We need a man for at least half time. Sidney, Thurman and Bartlett, all in this county, are without a pastor.—T. A. McKenzie, I. C. C. evangelist.

Kansas.

Louisburg, July 9.—We are in a great meeting here. Four added by statement and three by confession and baptism, seven the first day. All grown people but one. Large crowds are attending and we are praying for a great victory.—Clyde Lee Fife.

Moline, July 11.—Received five new members in last two weeks. Work moving on nicely.—J. A. W. Brown.

Marion, July 9.—Five additions here last Lord's day, three by confession and baptism, two from the sects.—W. M. Berkeley.

Wellington, July 9.—Four additions here yesterday. This makes fourteen not previously reported.—L. T. Faulders.

Michigan.

Saginaw, July 9.—Four additions yesterday by statement, two from another communion, making thirty-three at regular services in two months.—J. Murray Taylor.

Missouri.

Dexter, July 15.—The church here will give their minister, R. H. Lampkin, the fifth Sunday for missionary work, and the faithful few at Piggott, Ark., will get the benefit of the time. R. Clyde Tucher, one of the former members of the Dexter congregation, has been working hard to secure a working force and has succeeded so far as to organize with sixteen members and they have purchased a lot and have some money in bank for a building fund.

Trenton, July 10.—We are making commendable progress. Eight additions. The offerings to missions this year will be the largest in the history of the church. Dean W. J. Lhamon, of the Bible College, Columbia, was with us recently during our Chautauqua. He delivered six Bible lectures, and preached on Lord's day to three thousand people. The churches of Grundy county are all doing good work. A new Bible school was organized recently at the Berry church.—B. J. White.

New York.

Brooklyn, July 9.—Since our special meeting closed April 29, there have been eleven added to the Humboldt Street Church, eight by baptism, one by letter, two by statement. Forty-five added to church since April 1, 1906. Church in excellent condition.—Jos. Keevil.

Oregon.

Brownsville, July 9.—One baptized here yesterday and one received the Sunday before by statement. This makes two since our work began in December. We are planning for an advanced movement all along the line.—A. H. Mulkey.

Texas.

Fort Worth, July 9.—There were five additions at the Tabernacle Church yesterday.—A. E. Dubber.

Dalhart, July 10.—Just closed a two weeks' meeting with the minister, John Mullen, at this place with two accessions. This is a very difficult field, being a new railroad town. Closed with a full house and good interest.—Charles E. McVey, song evangelist.

Washington.

Waitsburg, July 6.—After three years of hard work in this field I have resigned, to take effect on or before October 1. The visible results of our labors here are one hundred and fifty additions to the church, over one hundred confessions, and a fine $12,000 church building. My successor will have one of the very best equipped buildings in the west. We will locate elsewhere in September or else take up evangelistic work.—W. T. Adams.

JESUS DINES WITH A PHARISEE.

—Luke 14:1-14.

Memory verses: 13, 14.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He that humbleth himself shall be exalted.—Luke 14:11.

Jesus felt free to go to the houses of publicans and sinners, but he also accepted the hospitality of Pharisees. As he showed no sense of superiority in the presence of the lowly, so he showed no sense of inferiority in the presence of men of high rank.

The old question of the method and spirit of Sabbath observance came up during this dinner at the Pharisee's house. Is it lawful to heal a sick man on the Sabbath. Early in his ministry (Luke 5, 6) Jesus had made a sharp issue with the Pharisaic legalism with reference to fasting and Sabbath keeping. Their view was that the whole duty of man was to keep the law as it was laid down in the book. His view was that man is worth more than law, and when the literal requirements of the law conflict with the demands of man's welfare the former must give way. It was not Jesus's purpose to set forth a new law in place of the old, but to show the inadequacy of the very concept of law for the purposes of religion. Nothing can be more inaccurate and misleading than the familiar statement that the Bible is primarily a law-book. The religion of Jesus can not be expressed in terms of law.

On another occasion, when about to heal a man on the Sabbath, Jesus reminded his hearers that they would consider it lawful to extricate a mired sheep on the Sabbath, and exclaimed, "How much more is a man worth than a sheep!" That is the principle fundamental to all his teaching and living—that man has a vast and incalculable value, and that the conservation of this value, both in himself and in others, is the chief business of man.

This feast also gave occasion for teaching two other lessons—one on humility and one on unselfish hospitality. At an Oriental feast, as at a modern court dinner, the order of precedence was carefully considered and each guest was anxious to get a position which would properly represent his own rank. But scrambling for preferment, says Jesus, is the poorest way to get it. To assert constantly one's claim to honor and precedence, is to invite rebuffs and consequent embarrassment. The road to honor is through humility.

As to hospitality, the words of Jesus suggest that the word needs to be redeemed to nobler uses. A mere exchange of social favors and courtesies, in which each party expects to get as much as he gives, is not hospitality. In many cases it is merely a pleasant and profitable device for self-advancement, or a method of purchasing entertainment for oneself by furnishing entertainment to others. This may be all right, so far as it goes. But it is not the discharge of one's "social duties." The real social duty involves the loving care of the unfortunate, the generous use of one's possessions for the good of other members of society. Without such consideration of the common good, there can be no society in the true sense, but only an aggregate of selfish individuals. Nineteen centuries of Christian civilization have brought only a very imperfect realization of the Master's ideal of a true society whose members should be bound together by a common and unselfish interest in each other's welfare.

THE NEW LIFE IN CHRIST.—

Col. 3:1-4.

"Go up, go up, my heart,
Dwell with thy God above;
For here thou canst not rest,
Nor here give out thy love.

"Let not thy love flow out
To things so soiled and dim;
Go up to heaven and God,
Take up thy love to Him."

No matter how highly one really be risen with Christ, he may still and will practice the Gospel of the helping hand. When one is too far removed to wreathe men's faces with smiles and improve the general condition of society he is exalted in pride rather than in Christ.

To be risen with Christ it is not only necessary we should first loose ourselves from the controlling love of things that have to do only with earth, but under the compelling power of a genuine new affection for our Savior we must begin seeking after the mercy, gentleness, helpfulness, love and all heavenly idealism that prevail without opposition when Christ is at the right hand of God.

There are no short cuts to the higher spiritual altitudes, or new processes of becoming risen with Christ. That is an estate attained unto by faith, repentance, confession and baptism; it is a region into which we unconsciously enter through growth in grace and the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is the result of adding to our faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and love.

As a man thinketh in his heart so is he. Our thoughts are weight or wings. "Brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things." Such thoughts will help us up into the new and higher life where Christ holds special audience with all his beloved who will enter in.

That we have merely come up from a submersion in water is no proof we have "risen with Christ." That we have buried the old nature together with all its grovelling proclivities and unhallowed idealism, and changed our affections from things on the earth, and are illustrating in our lives the principles of Christ's charity, benevolence, loving kindness, and holiness is far more satisfactory proof of our having risen. The formal doing of things enjoined in the Scriptures is but one wing by which we rise; the other is the inner possession of the spirit of which these formal procedures ought to be the natural expressions.

It is well that in all seriousness we ask ourselves whether we are dead to sin, that is, have wholly separated ourselves from sin. Lot's desire for city life led him to remonstrate with the angel that told him to flee from the plain and into the mountain. He said: "Behold now, this city is near to flee unto and it is a little one: Oh let me escape thither (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live." He evidently thought the guilt of disobedience would be minimized by the smallness of the city. But transgression is a sin so virulent that the least is fatal. Lot's going into this "small city" was followed by personal sorrows that are the most awful parents have to endure. Do we entertain Lot's delusion and believe there is no peril in our being a little covetous, a little vengeful, a little neglectful about waiting on the appointments of the Lord's house, a little worldly minded, a little careless with the truth and other people's good names and property? There is no more safety in our going from Sodom to a "little city" than Lot found. Quitting our sins is not to be done by degrees; it is a matter that is not done at all until done altogether. We must die to them, effect no compromise nor have any commerce with them at all if we would be risen with Christ and reign with him.

GARDINER AND MISSIONS TO LATIN AMERICA.—2 Cor. 11:23-30.

"If you can not be the watchman,
Standing high on Zion's wall,
Pointing out the path to heaven,
Offering life and peace to all;
With your prayers and your bounties
You can do what heaven demands.
You can be like faithful Aaron,
Holding up the prophet's hands."

Heaven is represented as a walled city that lieth four square, and on either side are three gates. Those southern gates are constant invitations to the inhabitants of Cape Colony, Tierra del Fuego, and all the Antarctic islands to come home. They are sure prophecies, too, that by the millions they will yet enter into the better land.

While trying to establish a mission in Tierra del Fuego in 1851, Gardiner lost this life to find another and a heavenly one, while about him was not the splendid staging of a death on his ship just as the enemy had lowered their flag and the boundaries of empire were hinging on the result, yet angels noted when he fell and there posterity will rear a monument above the last resting place of one of humanity's great liberators, and the story told at its base be inspiration to more universal liberty in Christ and the regeneration of a world.

It is said Lieutenant Gardiner, the South American missionary in labors most abundant of all, was converted by the reading of a narrative of the beautiful life of his mother written by his father. Here there is another splendid trophy for the diadem of Christian motherhood. The hand that rocked that cradle rocked South America into a sweet sleep after the nightmare of heathen superstition and catholic oppression and from which she is awakening into a new world of privilege, happiness, usefulness and glory. If the Southern continent lays tribute in heaven at the feet of the son, rest assured the mother will not be forgotten who bore him and inspired him to Christian nobility.

Lieutenant Gardiner was of truly knightly character. He resigned from a desirable position in the English navy for the life of a missionary, not to win renown or even the crown of martyrdom, but, seeing the degradation and sufferings of the inhabitants, the spirit of true chivalry he sought to bring to the Southern hemisphere the enlightenment and help and cheer of the Gospel. His object was not to get but to give. He gave years of sacrifice and finally his life, but his was the joy of seeing the true light begin to shine, and now from the heavens he can look down on a continent being redeemed, and seeing the travail of soul rest satisfied.

Not even in old Spain was catholicism so despotic and corrupt as it has long been south of the Rio Grande, but Latin America is now in the dawn of a better day. Notwithstanding the machinations of the priesthood legislation providing for religious toleration has been adopted in every land. This gives missionaries and mission houses the protection of law and guarantees to those people, who have long been in darkness almost as dense as that of heathenism, regenerative influences that will wonderfully bless them and make of them a blessing. Now is the day of great opportunity for Protestantism under the Southern cross.

The progress of Mexico under the presidency of Maximo Diaz is one of the marvels of modern times. It really seems to be "Americanized" in its business enterprise and ethics, in its social development and political idealism. This republic is grandly emerging from gross superstition and the weakness of ignorance and priestly cruelty and oppression up on to the higher levels of national life and usefulness. If the true God of Protestantism be coronated as her God, and primitive Christianity be the religion of her people, the land of the Montezumas will yet justify her enduement with such genial climate, rich mountains of metals and gems, such fertile soil, and a race of men with latent powers truly great. Mexico is a mission field whose conquest is one of the greatest prizes earth affords.

LETTERS AND SERMONS OF T. B. LARIMORE, Edited by Emma Page. McQuiddy Printing Company, 1904. Nashville, Tenn. Price $1.50.

This volume consists of 450 very solidly printed pages, with illustrations, about equally divided between sermons and letters by Brother Larimore, a well known evangelist of the south. The volume will be of especial interest to Brother Larimore's friends in the large number of churches where he has held meetings. A man of acknowledged piety, and good evangelistic ability, both his sermons and his letters breathe a healthy religious spirit. One chapter is devoted to the children, with illustrations. A good deal of space is given to correspondence between Brother Larimore and Brother F. D. Srygley, a personal friend, who published a former volume relating to Brother Larimore, and contains matter which would have no special interest except to the personal friends of these two men.

THE BOYS' LIFE OF CHRIST, by William B. Forbush, Ph.D. Funk and Wagnalls, New York. 326 pages. Price, $1.25 net.

A new study of the life of Christ is being engaged in by thousands of Christians all over the country this year, for that life of lives has become the topic around which the Sunday school lessons for 1906 center. This book deals simply with Jesus as the boys' hero. His life is presented in the form of one telling a story and the author has achieved great success in his effort. Of course, it does not go into too great details, does not touch the theology or the philosophy of Jesus' life, nor emphasize the miraculous. It rather concerns itself with what he did do, the purpose of the author being to create a liking for the character of Christ with the hope that this will interest young people in that other story of his life narrated in the Gospels. especially by Mark. The author has been eminently successful, though his task was not an easy one.

DR. J. R. LUCAS.

Peace, peace, he is not dead, he doth not sleep;
he hath awakened from the dream of life.—Shelley.

This tribute of love from a grateful heart is written in sacred memory of Dr. J. R. Lucas, who a while ago passed from the toils of earth to the rest of heaven. The last hour of his long and useful life came upon him in the home of his daughter, Mrs. S. H. Wooten, in the city of Chicago. His work was done and he was patiently waiting for the pale messenger with the inverted torch.

Dr. Lucas was born in Pennsylvania seventy-five years ago. He belonged to a good family with a beautiful name, and one which has given to the world many distinguished preachers, teachers and physicians. Our brother—like his namesake, the companion of the Apostle Paul—was both a minister of the Gospel and a beloved physician whose praise was in all the churches. His labors reached over many of the states of the middle west. He had a genius for work. In personal appearance he was as handsome as Absalom. In statue rather below the medium, graceful, with a short body, a classic face set in a framework of long curly hair,and a head denoting a strong intellect, he had also a splendid voice and a good command of language. He had versatility of talents and varied accomplishments. In evangelistic work and in the public discussions which used to be in vogue he had few equals. He met in debate many able and distinguished men. In such discussions he was inimicable. He always remembered the old saying, that "whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." He never allowed himself to be betrayed into showing ill temper or saying unkind things. No greater man ever broke bread at the table of a court. To say or to do a harsh thing gave him nights of solitude and sorrow. The writer of this tribute was an inmate of his home during the two beautiful years spent as a student in Christian University. It was in this way that he came to know Dr. Lucas, both as a father and a friend. The memories of his home linger in his heart as a star in the sky. The one event which contributed more than any other earthly influence to the good doctor's happiness and usefulness was his marriage to Miss Margaret Lowe, a woman whose disposition is as rosy as the morning and as gentle as the dawn. Her children rise up and call her blessed. Her husband also praised her. Great will be her reward in heaven when out of every ingredient of bitterness and sorrow she comes at last to reach the ends to receive the crown.

"How'er it be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

The Old Home Church.

MAURICE F. PLACE.

The old home church? Ah, memory,
No brighter picture dwells in thee,
Than of the humble house of God,
Where as a child my feet hath trod,
In love secure!
Methinks I see the old spire rise,
A finger, beckoning toward the skies;
No pretext here toward great nor grand,
But just a humble, helping hand,
To lives more pure.
Old friends I see pass through the door,
With hearty handshakes as of yore.
I feel a warmth and welcome here,
The sweet and sacred atmosphere
Of other days.
I dream of those who were fed,
With Jesus Christ, the living bread;
Tarrying awhile, and one by one,
To other fields—with duties done,
They went their ways.
How many hearts, no man can say,
Ofttimes look back, as I to-day,
With retrospection, sweet and glad,
For that rare part this church has had,
In lives of men.
And when I reach my journey's end,
With none but Jesus to befriend;
How precious then the place and hour,
That Jesus came in love and power,
Te be my friend.

PART III.

CHAPTER III.

Mrs. Bannerton showed Rhoda to the bath room on the second floor, and, having provided her with one of her own dresses, told Raymund to wait for his sister in the kitchen. "You will want to have a talk before you go to bed," she said. "I will come to you at 10 o'clock and show you both to your different rooms." Mrs. Bannerton went to get the rooms ready. She was a widow and made her living by keeping lodgers. When the rooms were ready she came back and had a pleasant talk with Raymund while he was waiting for Rhoda. Mrs. Bannerton told him that she had a son at West Point and a daughter at the Boston Conservatory. She had worked very hard to give her son the education necessary to enable him to enter the examination contest, and she was now obliged to save every penny to keep her daughter in the conservatory. "Never any rest for me, said Mrs. Bannerton, smiling, "but my daughter has great musical talent, and I am only too glad that I am strong and can give her the advantages I never had myself. As for my son, if he had gone out to earn his living he could have made nothing of himself but a common workman. But you see, such as I am, I am already made; so I could work and give him his opportunity. One can not work for one's living and polish one's self at the same time."

"It seems very hard to be poor," sighed Raymund.

"It is harder to be rich," said Mrs. Bannerton, laughing out in enjoyment of her quick thought. Raymund laughed too, and presently, although Raymund had not one 5-cent piece more than before, he began to feel more hopeful.

Mrs. Bannerton, hearing Rhoda's bare feet slipping through the hall, left the kitchen that the two might be alone. Raymund was startled by the transformation which the gaslight revealed. Rhoda was herself again. The light, silken hair with its gleam of silver swung down her back to dry. Her splendid blue eyes looked from a face whose soft, creamy complexion well suited the quaint hair. Mrs. Bannerton's long dress made the girl of 15 look like a woman; she was as tall as Mrs. Bannerton, and her form had a suppleness and grace that did not belong to the landlady. She beamed upon Raymund, and holding up the dress ran at him with a little coo.

"Why, Rhoda!" cried Raymund, holding her off and gazing upon her, "how old you look, and how pretty!" Then he let her slip her arms about him. "Your hair is darker," she said. "Oh, you poor boy! how you have had to work!" Then she discovered the green umbrella. "Why, Raymund! all the time I never once saw that." She snatched it up and buried her face in the faded folds. "But I haven't mother's Bible," she said, looking up. "I was in such a hurry to leave that dreadful house, I was afraid to go back for it."

"I am sorry," said Raymund.

"Yes," said Rhoda, "it had Uncle William's address written in it."

"Oh, but we know that by heart," said the other, disposed to make her think as lightly as possible of her loss.

"Yes," we know it," said Rhoda, "but I don't like for Mrs. Van Estry and those people to see it. It makes me think that it might get us into trouble for them to know anything about us!"

"Don't you worry about those people," said Raymund. "You'll never hear of them again. I've been thinking while I sat here waiting for you; I believe I'll try to find some kind of work here in the city. Now that we're here, and nobody wants us anywhere else, I might as well see what's to be done in this quarter."

"It might be a good thing," said Rhoda, doubtfully, "but let's talk about to-morrow. Now, the first thing is to get me some clothes. Although it's June and so very warm, it wouldn't do to go barefooted in the house, and I couldn't go on the street in this dress of Mrs. Bannerton's."

"Oh, of course not," said Raymund, easily. "I've got lots of money; you leave everything to me; I'll trick you out, don't you fear!"

"You are the dearest boy!" cried his sister, giving him a squeeze. "But do tell me what you mean to buy!"

"I think it had better be a surprise," said Raymund.

"Well, just tell me about the shoes."

"I'll get you good, serviceable shoes," was the answer; "the kind you can walk in, the kind that won't wear out or split; I am very particular to get the kind that don't hurt a person's feet."

"What number, for instance, Raymund?"

"Well, I reckon about fours will do."

"Oh, Raymund!" cried Rhoda, remonstrating.

"Well," said Raymund, quickly, "I'll get four and a half."

Rhoda laughed and said: "What kind of a dress?"

"A ready-made dress," was the prompt answer.

"I think that would be wise, too," remarked Rhoda, "but I was asking about the material."

"Oh, I was thinking about one of these thin blue kind, you know, that show your arm through the goods and don't look slick, and a white underskirt, for I don't like colored underskirts at all, Rhoda; not at all!"

"What kind of a hat, Raymund?"

"I don't like feathers, do you?" said Raymund. "And I don't like streaming ribbons; and I don't like those little things that are stuck on one side and can't keep off the sun."

"Now, I tell you what we'll do," said Rhoda, with decision. "We will give Mrs. Bannerton some money and ask her to buy me as little as I can get along with, and what you will do is to buy something to eat and bring it here for breakfast."

They were busy talking when Mrs. Bannerton came to show them to their rooms. Rhoda's was the basement. After an affectionate good-night, Raymund went up to his chamber on the third floor. It was a room just large enough for a bed and a few pieces of furniture. The gas made a brighter light than the country boy was used to. It brought out with sharp distinctness the cracked pitcher, about which a wire was tightened, the cracked slop jar, around which a double wire was coiled, the cracked mirror over the broken stand that served as a dresser, the dingy calico drapery which fenced off a corner and served as a closet. This movable closet and the bed which was across the window, filled half the room. There was a chair and an oblong space where a trunk might have been disposed, and a narrow lane between this well defined space and the table, by means of which one might journey from the door to the bed. "You will find," said Mrs. Bannerton, "that it is almost impossible to get a room on this street at a dollar a week, or on any respectable street. But there is no flue in this room, so it is hard to let it in winter, and that is why the price is so low."

Raymund murmured his satisfaction with the room, paid her in advance for the week and was left alone behind a door which could not be locked. He was, indeed, in high glee over the room. It was his first experience of the sort, and he felt that he had gained a distinctly advantageous experience. It could no longer be said that he was unused to city ways, and that he had never rented a room. For the present, all this was his own property—the nondescript, soiled wall paper, the linty carpet, the iron bedstead, the white lead pipe that came in through the ceiling in one corner, then stopped abruptly as if it had entered by mistake, and so came to nothing, the gas jet which could be doubled up or stretched out three joints, and which had a little piece of cotton cloth jammed into one of the joints, a tin matchbox nailed to the wall just over the cracked mirror, the drab-colored door which smelled like soap, though it had apparently never used any, the open window, the dirty shutters and, above all, the view of the outside world. A long time after he had turned out the gas, and even after he had gotten out of bed to stand on a chair with his nose to each joint to be sure there was no leaking, Raymund looked out the window as he lay on the bed.

Directly below the window was the basement yard, and he knew that one of the windows looking into that damp, littered oblong was from Rhoda's room. Beyond the basement yard and about 10 feet above its blackened brick floor, was a wide, green sward, running up to a residence which stood with its back to Raymund's window. And beyond that were high brick buildings from whose windows lights shone steadily. And beyond them swung higher lights. Far, far away, many streets removed, was a house at least ten stories high; and although so remote, its lights showed Raymund men working in their shirt sleeves. He wondered what they were doing, and if they stayed up all night, and wondering, he fell asleep.

When he woke up it was strange not to hear Tom and Fred stirring about in the Hands' House; it was strange not to have to leap from bed at early dawn and hurry on his clothes; it was strange to hear men calling "Ra-a-a-aspberries!" when at home strawberries were hardly ripe. When Raymund went below, he did not have long to wait before Rhoda came up from the basement. He told her to go to his room and he would bring something to eat. When he reached the street he stared hard at the house to be sure of knowing it again, and he copied the number in his notebook. Luckily there was a store in sight, and he went thither. When he joined Rhoda in his room he held several parcels. There was no place to put them except upon the chair, so he and Rhoda sat on the edge of the bed and opened the crackers, dried beef and bananas. "It was all I could find," said Raymund, "except cheese and crackers, and I thought it too early for that."

"Much too early," said Rhoda, fingering a piece of the clammy dried beef and then popping it into her mouth for fear she might change her mind. Raymund imitated her example. They chewed and chewed, but the dried beef did not give an inch. "We don't have to do this, do we?" said Rhoda, suddenly.

"Of course not!" cried Raymund, taking out his tough morsel and casting it from the window. He proffered the bananas.

"Isn't it funny," said Rhoda, "this long, hard rib that runs through the banana? You ought to have got some boneless bananas, Ray!"

Raymund laughed and nibbled on a musty cracker. As he leaned back to throw it out the window after his dried beef, he saw a man in the yard beyond the basement, watching him. It was a very disagreeable looking man of middle age, and his stare was so intent and so evil that Raymund could not but believe that the watcher was spying upon him. Why should anybody do that? Could it be that this man had followed Rhoda from Mrs. Van Estry's? As soon as the watcher found that Raymund had discovered him he slunk behind the residence and was seen no more. Raymund became very grave, but Rhoda thought his gravity was occasioned by the light breakfast, and her brother did not reveal what he had seen. There was no need, he thought, of frightening his companion.

Two laborers set out from Wexford to walk to Dublin. By the time they reached Bray they were very much tired with their journey, and the more so when they were still twelve miles from Dublin. "Be me sowl," said one, after a little thought; "sure it's but six miles apiece; let us walk on!"

One Won.

"Tom, I learn you're quite a church worker, would you mind telling me what started you in this direction?" said a friend to a young Canadian, who was in business in New York, and just home for a holiday.

"Well," said Tom, "it was only a little thing that seemed to start me, and yet I suppose that it wasn't a little thing, after all.

"Soon after I went to New York I wandered out one Sunday morning for a stroll. I knew nobody, and knew nothing at all about any of the churches. In passing one of the churches I saw an usher standing in the door. He gave me a pleasant bow, and, as it was not far from church time, I walked in. I had nowhere else to go.

"The singing was good, and the preaching was quite interesting. But nothing specially struck me till I was passing out—the pastor shook hands with me, and asked me to stay a few minutes; he wanted to see me. An usher took me to the parlor. In a few minutes the pastor came in, and asked me my name, and where I boarded, and what I worked at. He took it all down in his note-book.

"At the evening service I didn't go to church, but in the 11 o'clock mail the next morning I received a card from the pastor, saying he had missed me at the evening service, and that he would call on me the same evening at 8 o'clock.

"I stayed in, and he came round and stayed half an hour, and got me to promise to be at prayer-meeting Wednesday night. I went partly against my inclination, but he was so kind I felt obliged to go. He invited me to service and his Bible class next Sunday.

"Well, it went on from that. In a few Sundays the superintendent asked me to take a class, and I've settled down into an old church-worker now."

This young man is now a trusted worker in one of New York's "people's churches," and a heavy contributor to it. He is a success from a business standpoint, but of much greater value to the moral life of the city.

The pastor who found him was doing what many a faithful pastor is doing in his community—adding to the strength and stability of society in developing young people in Christian character and usefulness.

James G. Gray, Gibson, Mo., write about Drake's Palmetto Wine as follows: "I live in the Missouri Swamps in Dunklin County, and have been sick with Malarial fever, and for fifteen months a walking skeleton. One bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine has done me more good than all the medicine I have taken in that fifteen months. I am buying two more bottles to stay cured. Drake's Palmetto Wine is the best medicine and tonic for Malaria, Kidney and Liver ailments I ever used or heard of. I feel well now after using one bottle."

A. A. Felding, Knoxville, Tenn., writes: "I had a bad case of sour Stomach and Indigestion. I could eat so little that I was 'falling to bones' and could not sleep nor attend to my business. I used the test bottle and two large seventy-five cent bottles, and can truthfully say I am entirely cured. I have advised many to write for a free test bottle."

J. W. Moore, Monticello, Minn., makes the following statement about himself and a neighbor. He says: "Four bottles of Drake's Palmetto Wine has cured me of Catarrh of Bladder and Kidney Trouble. I suffered ten years and spent hundreds of dollars with the best doctors and specialists without benefit. Drake's Palmetto Wine has made we a well man. A young woman here was given up to die by a Minneapolis specialist, and he and our local doctor said they could do no more for her. She has been taking Drake's Palmetto Wine one week and is rapidly recovering."

The Drake Co., Wheeling, W. Va., will send a test bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine, a purely vegetable compound, free and prepaid to any reader of this paper. A letter or postal card is your only expense to get this free bottle.

The opportune time is now while the land is cheap. The country is settling up. If you purchase land now you will soon see grow up around you a community of prosperous energetic men who like yourself have seen the brighter possibilities of the Southwest, and have taken advantage of them.

Along the line of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas R'y in Indian Territory, Oklahoma, and Texas are vast areas of unimproved land—land not now yielding the crops of which it is capable. The same thing, in a different way, is true of the towns. Few lines of business are adequately represented. There are openings of all sorts for you. If you're in any way interested in the Southwest, I'd like to send you a copy of my free paper, "The Coming Country."

August 7th and 21st

you can make a trip Southwest exceptionally cheap. Round trip tickets, good thirty—30—days, will be sold by all lines in connection with the M. K. & T. R'y at not more than one fare plus $2.00; in many cases—from Chicago to San Antonio, e. g., the rate is $25.00, from St. Paul, $27.50, from St. Louis and Kansas City, $20.00—the rates are considerably lower. The tickets permit of stop-overs in both directions, via M., K. & T. R'y.

If your nearest railroad agent cannot give you the rates, write me for particulars.

My Father's World.

This is my Father's world.
  O let me ne'er forget
That tho' the wrong seems oft' so strong,
  God is the ruler yet.
This is my Father's world.
  The battle is not done.
Jesus who died shall be satisfied,
  And earth and Heaven be one.
This is my Father's world.
  Should my heart be ever sad?
The Lord is King—let the heavens ring.
  God reigns——let the earth be glad.

Nature's Little Things.

BY REV. FRANCIS L. STRICKLAND, PH. D.

From the day when the Florentine Galileo with his first rude telescope bestowed the gift of a new vision upon his fellows, to the present, men have not ceased to wonder at the infinite reaches of space beyond this world of ours—distances quite beyond our ability to conceive. The telescope sweeps the heavens, and brings within our sight new worlds and new systems of worlds in the universe of unknown vastness about us.

The compound miscroscope in its humbler sphere reveals a no less wonderful world of beauty and perfection beneath us. This instrument has done a noble work for truth. Not only has it revealed many of the secrets of disease, and thus enabled us to fight more successfully to alleviate pain and prolong human life, but it has also helped some of us to grasp more firmly the great truth of God's power, wisdom, and care. It is strange that men who have looked down the wonder-revealing tube, and have studied the absolute perfection of detail, and the marvelous delicacy of adjustment in the world of organic life, could ever have doubted that there exists a Supreme Thinker and Worker who guides and rules in the realm of nature.

But my present purpose is to tell something of the profit and delight to be gotten from amateur microscopy. There is no scientific recreation that quite equals it. To begin with, it carries its devotees out of doors. In order to secure materials for the stage of the microscope we must explore the ponds and ditches, and find our way to the gardens, woods, and fields. And the revelations of the microscope from the world of nature are more stimulating to the intellect than any others accessible to the nonprofessional student of nature.

Yes, you say, this may be quite true, but a compound microscope is a very expensive affair, and so the delights of microscopical study and diversion are shut off from many young people who might be glad to enter the fairy gardens of the microscopic world. But, fortunately for you, you are wrong. A plain but serviceable compound microscope is not very expensive in these days. If one wishes to study the starry heavens as an amateur astronomer, he can not do very much without a small telescope, the cost of which is far beyond the capacity of moderate purses. But to explore the almost infinite realms of that world whose wonders are too small for our unaided eyes, requires only an instrument which may be bought for twenty dollars, or even less. While a student in college my father gave me a substantial microscope costing $25. To this I have added a couple of higher power lenses, and a few simple accessories, acquired from time to time as I was able. Thus the expense of my instrument has been hardly felt during the ten years in which I have enjoyed its possession. And my equipment, simple as it is, is more elaborate than is really necessary for the fullest enjoyment of microscopical study and diversion. But the moderate sum invested has brought a great many times its value in healthful recreation and profitable diversion.

We often hear it said that people whose work confines them should cultivate a "hobby" which will take them out of doors and engage the thoughts in ways entirely different from those of the regular occupation. Of the several hobbies I have tried, the microscope is the most lasting.

Every year, when the warm days of early summer come, the blood of the amateur microscopist begins to tingle, and he watches his chance to get away with his collecting bottles and pocket magnifier, to wander along the edge of pond or stream. And then, after the outdoor ramble, comes the joy of sitting down quietly at home with the miscroscope, and exploring the new worlds contained in a few drops of pond water or a speck of green slime. And here is diversion for hours, if one has the time to spend, and profit, too, for the microscope not only enlarges our powers of physical vision, but broadens our mental outlook, affording a culture which the appreciative study of nature always gives.

And through this wonder-working tube what new and undreamed of beauties open up in every direction! There is no object made in the great laboratory of the Creator which, when properly placed and lighted on the stage of the microscope, will not repay careful study and reveal its wonders. Common insects and their various parts, the tiniest of the garden seeds, very thin sections of various woods and stems, the parts of wild and cultivated flowers; the myriad organisms, both animal and vegetable, which inhabit pond water; feathers of birds, scales of butterflies, hairs, leaves—these and a thousand other objects afford a realm whose mysteries can never be fully explored.

And what lessons are to be learned by the way! Showing a friend a specimen through the microscope recently, he said enthusiastically, "It's great!" and it was great, though it measured only one two hundred and fiftieth of an inch. Greatness is not a matter of size or linear dimensions. We gain some idea of the extent of the world of life beneath us when we learn the half-way point with respect to size between the elephant, the largest animal now existing, and the smallest organism, is the red ant! In other words, the microscope shows us living organisms as much smaller than the ant as the ant is smaller than the elephant. This may seem incredible, but it is true.

But I must tell you in a few words of some of the better known people of the invisible world to whom the microscope serves as an introduction. Let us begin with the smallest.

We take a half tumbler of pure water, into which a few scraps of raw meat have been thrown, and set it in the sun for a few hours. Examining with a moderately high power of the microscope a drop of the water which has become a little cloudy, we find it teeming with myriads of strange looking beings that look like animated corkscrews, sticks, and strings of beads. These are "bacteria," whose name means sticks. Where did they come from? From the air. When we put the meat into the water we formed what the scientific men call a "culture," that is, a medium in which the bacteria will quickly multiply. That these little creatures came from the air is easily proved. If we boil the water in a glass test-tube, and then plug the end tightly with cotton batting, no bacteria will appear. These little beings, which are classed as vegetable rather than animal, are very minute. It would take nearly six thousand of the larger kinds placed end to end to make an inch in length. Many people fancy that all bacteria are harmful, but this is not so; most of the brood are harmless. Only a comparatively small number are the causes of disease; and most of these are harmful only when they get a chance to multiply in our tissues because of a weakened condition of the system.

But there are organisms more interesting to us than the bacteria, and more easy to look at. We go to a stagnant pond, and take a little water, a few leaves of duckweed, and a little green slime. Now we have the material for many hours of instructive diversion.

Here is a water flea. He is a giant in the microscopical world for we can see him with the naked eye, as a tiny, jumping speck in the water. But with a low power of the microscope we see right through him, for he is transparent, and we need no X-rays. His lungs are at work, and his stomach is digesting some unfortunate little creature that he ate for breakfast.

He is interesting, but not more so than the green hydra. This individual can change his size and shape at every turn. Now he is spread out with eight long tentacles or arms, ready to grab his prey. But a tap on the glass slide frightens him, and quicker than thought he has become a mere mass of greenish-brown jelly.

Here is a rotifer, who, instead of having a mouth and jaws, has a circular series of long thin fins, with which he creates a current down his throat, thus sucking in many helpless little fellows who begin to digest before they know where they are! This crown of fins looks like a wheel when in operation, and hence the name of these creatures—the "rotifers," or wheel-bearers.

The water contains a host of things which we cannot examine in detail. Here is a green globe beautifully netted, and containing bright spots of red, rolling about in the jolliest fashion. He is the famous volvox. Here is a red spot with a wiggling tail, rushing about in the wildest way, never getting anywhere, but always in a great hurry. His name is monad. Here is a snake-like creature twisting in and out among the debris, and making his dinner out of the garbage of the microscopical world. Here are strange creatures that look like felt hats with a string tied to them. They are the vorticellids. Here also is a great dragon—a terrible beast with fearful jaws. He will be a mosquito some day. He is only an eight of an inch long, but through the microscope he looks as big as an alligator.

I would like to have you see through the microscope the spider and his web, the strands of which are not simple threads, but tiny ropes, made up of a great many threads stuck together—more than you would believe, I am afraid. But enough has been said to suggest the vastness and wonder of that world we cannot see with the unaided eye. And if some one after reading these words resolves to save up for a microscope, and study Nature's kingdom of minute greatness, some good will have been accomplished by what is here set forth.

The microscope gives us new revelations of God. We find out how beautiful God's work always is. His power and wisdom are seen in the perfect little organisms whose world is a drop of water, just as surely as in the distant worlds that swing through boundless space—

"for no more
It costs Omnipotence to build a world
And set a sun amidst the firmament,
Than mould a dewdrop, and light up its gems."

—Epworth Herald.

"But, ma, Uncle John eats with his knife."

"Hush, dear. Uncle John is rich enough to eat with a fire shovel if he prefers to."

"The chimney is smoking," he said.

"Yes," she retorted; "that's the effect of bad example. Usually the chimney has consideration enough to do its smoking outdoors."

Thus it came about that he finished his cigar on the back porch.

What Became of Them?

Fifty years ago a gentleman of Ohio noted down ten drinkers, six young men and four boys. "I saw the boys," he says, "drink beer and buy cigars in what was then called a 'grocery' or 'doggery.' I expressed my disapprobation and the seller gave a coarse reply. He continued the business, and in fifteen years he died of delirium tremens, not leaving five dollars.

"I never lost sight of these ten, only as the clods of the valley hid their bodies from human vision. Of the six young men, one died of delirium tremens and one in a drunken fit; two died of disease produced by their excesses before they reached the meridian of life; two of them left families not provided for, and two sons are drunkards. Of the remaining, one is a miserable wreck, and the other a drinker in some better condition.

"Of the four boys, one, who had a good mother, grew up a sober man; one was killed by a club in a drunken brawl; one has served two terms in the penitentiary; and one has drunk himself into an inoffensive dole whose family has to provide for him."—National Advocate.

Unless you use "Gloria in Excelsis," it makes little difference what song book you select. This imperial song book may be bought of us for $5, $6.50, $8, $9.50 or $12 per dozen, or at $40, $50, $65, $75 or $95 per 100—owing to the bindings selected and whether the unabridged or abridged form is ordered.

We have just taken from the press a new edition of A. McLean's Missionary Addresses, with statistics and other interesting missionary facts and features of the world's progress brought down to date. With this, too, is a compilation of the world's best missionary literature, as viewed by Bro. McLean. $1.00 postpaid.

Bridge Across Niagara.

"Enclosed find $50 for balance on 'Gloria in Excelsis Hymnal.' The books are giving the best of satisfaction."—George H. Brown (minister), Charleston, Ill. This is one of many tributes paid to this imperial song book. We have a large variety of smaller and cheaper, but excellent, song books for Bible schools, revivals and missions.

"To-day I received the picture of Bro. Garrison you sent me the 10th inst. Thanks. I assure you I appreciate it. With Christian regards."—Andrew Scott, minister, Danville, Ill. This excellent 11x12½ likeness of our beloved Editor we are sending as a premium for one renewal and a new subscriber to The Christian-Evangelist, accompanied by $3.

Of course we sell The Twentieth Century New Testament—$1.00 postpaid. A tentative edition of this translation into the vernacular of the people was printed in 1902. The criticisms and suggestions were studied and with their aid a permanent edition was printed last year and is now being sold by thousands. Its insets, indices and paragraphing, as well as the popular translation itself, are very valuable.

The Buffalo convention promises to be the largest and most interesting held or to be held between the Cincinnati jubilee in 1900 and the Pittsburg centennial in 1909. The Christian-Evangelist Special will take a great and happy throng over the Wabash. If you are not incorrigibly despondent, come with us. Write us at once to tell you how to secure free transportation to this great assembly.

Why experiment with sectarian and often untried paragraphers when at no greater cost you can secure the W. W. Dowling series of Bible-school Helps and papers for Children and Youth. After passing by the Dowling there seems to be little choice, but why pass by the best? For thirty years they have been used by most of our schools and with growing approbation. Here you may safely trust the judgment of the majority. Samples sent on application.

The steady but rapid growth of our circulation has not yet yielded to summer fatigue. While the vast majority of our new subscribers are sent singly by pleased patrons, we note the following clubs of new readers received last week: Port Jefferson, Ohio, 11 (William Waggoner, minister); Versailles, Ill., 14 (A. J. Campbell, minister); Girard, Ill., 7 (J. Winbigler, pastor); Decatur, Ill., 14 (J. L. Thompson, minister); East St. Louis, Ill., 28 (W. H. Jones, minister); Bethel, Conn., 3; Denver, Ill., 3; Rushville, Ill., 4 (Walter E. Harmon, pastor); Ruston, La., 3 (John A. Stevens, minister); Worcester, Mass., 3 (Harry Minnick, pastor); Winston-Salem, N. C., 3 (J. A. Hopkins, pastor).

A popular and exceptionally successful evangelist whose fall and winter campaigns begin September 1, writes a requisition for 500 Christian-Evangelists per week for distribution in the homes of the people in the various communities where he will labor. This will not only insure him a house full of hearers but prepare listeners as well. Here, too, those who have not known of us as a people will learn the real motives and true genius of this Restoration as they could not be learned from papers that do not love to tell them or that delight more in controversy and litigiousness than preaching the old Jerusalem Gospel. We commend his example to all evangelists.

CHATTANOOGA, SEPTEMBER 18-20, 1906.

On September 18, 1906, will occur the forty-third anniversary of the Battle of Chickamauga. It is proposed to celebrate this memorable event with a reunion of the various regiments that participated in this memorable battle and the various battles fought around Chattanooga. This reunion will be held at Chickamauga National Park, September 18, 19 and 20, and the present indications are that it will be the largest and most notabe gathering ever held in the South. On the above dates, the remnants from the armies of twelve states, comprising the following: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Kentucky, will assemble, many for the first and last time since they marched from its blood-stained fields, forty-three years ago.

Here is one of the great opportunities for the education of the youth. Don't fail to take your children and show them historic Chattanooga, with all its historical connections. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Go and see the old war generals and other officers point out the places of interest on the battlefield; let them show you and explain, in person, the markers erected on the battlefield showing the positions of the opposing armies at the time of battle. It will not be long until none will be left to do this noble work.

It will be many years, if ever again, that such an opportunity will present itself. See that your tickets read via the Louisville & Nashville R. R., the Battlefield Route. Call on your nearest railroad agent for rates and advertising matter pertaining to the reunion, or write nearest representative of the Louisville & Nashville R. R.

WHAT HAST THOU DONE?

BY FLORENCE YARRELL

WHERE is the product of thy brain or hand?
Hast thou sown good seed in this great, broad land?
Hast lightened the burden of any one?
Answer to God before the setting sun—
What hast thou done?

As the sun goes down in the gilded west,
Ere a busy world has taken its rest,
Ask thy conscience ere the night has begun—
And the day its eternal course has run—
What hast thou done?

Answer this truly and make no mistake;
Didst add to sad heart one joy, or an ache?
The higher walk—hast thou ever begun?
Answer quickly—for thy race is most run—
What hast thou done?

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
  Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
  The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
  For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
  Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
  And the song of victory.

1809 CENTENNIAL PROPAGANDA CHURCHES OF CHRIST 1909

: : : GEO. L. SNIVELY : : :

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

The leaven is working. Not only are our state and national secretaries doing all in their power to make the best possible showing by 1909, but our ministers are evolving many ingenious plans for enlarging and ennobling our local Zions. The method devised by Bro. Charles Fillmore and outlined below, is both novel and suggestive. We commend it to the consideration of pastors, Bible school superintendents and the officers of our Endeavor societies.

We shall be pleased to print other suggestions having the same end in view, particularly if they have been tried and proven successful by their authors. Any plan is better than aimlessness. A good plan well worked is preferable to a better one allowed to fall into "innocuous desuetude." The first bell was rung at Omaha, the second one is ringing, the time remaining is comparatively brief. Awake sleepers, work dreamers, let us all enthusiastically enter upon what our hands find to do; let every congregation be a hive of industry; let every man be a hero in the struggle against indifference, lethargy and opposition, and the extension of the church, the salvation of men, the honors thus won for the King will invest us all with glory giving us entree to the highest spiritual privileges on earth and before which heaven's gates will swing at last.

The Kentucky Centennial.

The Christian Bible schools of Kentucky and their friends propose to endow a new department of Bible school pedagogy in the College of the Bible at Lexington, Ky., as their centennial enterprise. To do this it will be necessary for the sum of $25,000 to be raised, which is to be added to the permanent endowment of the College of the Bible. The college proposes in return for this to employ a man who is to teach the work of the Sunday school to every student who receives a diploma. In addition to this a special two years' course is to be arranged which teachers and superintendents in the Bible schools may take and for the satisfactory completion of which a certificate will be issued by the college. This course will include sacred history as it is now taught, the public reading of the scripture, vocal music and the art of teaching it in the Bible schools, and the new course on the organization, management and instruction of Bible schools. The college also proposes to furnish such additional courses as may be found necessary or expedient as the demand arises.

This matter has been under advisement for some time. A letter of inquiry was addressed to many prominent preachers, Bible school workers and educators in the state, to which replies have been received which exhibit almost perfect unanimity with regard to the proposed enterprise.

Among those favorably responding are Geo. A. Miller, Covington; J. W. Morrison, Burris A. Jenkins, Lexington; E. T. Lafferty, Cynthiana; E. L. Powell, J. B. Briney, Louisville; Mary A. Finch, Helena Station; C. R. Hudson, Frankfort; R. H. Crossfield, Owensboro; Geo. C. Long, Hopkinsville; Carey E. Morgan, Paris; J. T. Kackley, Maysville. Certainly this is a step forward which will be welcomed by all who are interested in the cause of Bible study and particularly by those engaged in the service of the Bible schools.

Centennial Centurion Bands.

BY CHAS. M. FILLMORE.

The church at Carthage, O., a suburb of Cincinnati, in order to be in line for the centennial celebration in 1909, is preparing for an unusually vigorous campaign for the fall and winter. This is one of the historic churches of the brotherhood, having been organized by Walter Scott in 1832, and having under consideration plans for the celebration of its diamond anniversary in June, 1907.

The plans for the coming fall and winter campaign are being organized along ancient Roman army lines. The primary purpose is the enlistment of a "Centurion Band" or one hundred new members of the Lord's army. Along with this, efforts will be made to enroll a "Centurion Band" of one hundred new pupils in the Bible school.

Then, in order to make these new members an integral part of the present army of the Lord, efforts will be put forth to enroll a "Centurion Band" of one hundred new regular attendants at the Sunday morning service, a "Centurion Band" of one hundred new attendants at the Sunday evening service; a "Centurion Band" of one hundred new attendants at the midweek prayer-meeting.

In addition to these, there will be raised a special fund of $100 in $1 pledges for general expenses; and $100 in $1 pledges for the new building fund.

For the accomplishment of this work there will be organized a "Centurion Band" of one hundred "Whatsoeverers"—men, women, boys and girls, who will pledge themselves to do whatsoever they can to make the campaign a complete success.

To recapitulate, the plan contemplates:

Centennial Propagandists.

THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has ever been a great paper, and just now it seems to be destined to stand first among religious journals. Let it hold fast and consistently to the sublime and inspiring truths of the restoration of New Testament Christianity, and as a consequence Christian unity will come, and it will not be long until it will grow in numbers and influence by leaps and bounds. Holding as in a grip of steel these fundamentals and propagating them in terms that are Christian and practicing what we preach, we shall soon take this world for Christ. I want to see if I can not introduce the paper into a number of our homes.—H. C. Kendrick, minister.

Current Events

Indian Schools.

When Congress, by the act of June 7, 1897, declared it to be "the settled policy of the government hereafter to make no appropriation for education in any sectarian school," it might have been expected to put an end to the practice of subsidizing Catholic Indian schools. Most of the Protestant schools had already ceased to ask aid. But the obvious intention of this act has not been completely carried out. The government has entered into a contract with the St. Francis Roman Catholic Boarding School to care for 250 children of the Sioux Indians of the Rosebud agency, South Dakota, for $27,000 a year. A petition signed by 212 members of the tribe requested this appropriation of their money. A counter petition signed by 921 members opposes it. The government will be very blind if, in opposition to the will of a large majority of the Indians themselves, in opposition to the general sentiment of the people at large, and in opposition to the expressed will of Congress, it persists in this appropriation. It is not a question of whether, in this particular case, better educational results can be obtained by giving the money to a sectarian school. It is a question of whether or not we want church and state separated or united. Most of the founders of this republic were pious men; and certainly they must have foreseen that, if the church were not supported by the state, the offices of religion must cease in many communities. Yet they thought it better for the church to languish in some places than for it to be supported by the state. And it will be better for Indian education to languish for a time in some places than for the state to support sectarian schools. All this, we admit, has been said a great many times before. We have said it ourselves, in substance, more than once. But it will not be a dead issue so long as any branch of the government forgets that it has already been settled the other way and acts in opposition to the will of the people and the dictates of good policy.

Dreyfus Again.

Dreyfus has been acquitted, restored to his rank in the French army and assigned to active duty. Here, let us hope, the incident finally ends. First he was condemned on a charge of treason for betraying military secrets to Germany, and sent to solitary confinement on Devil's Island for life. After five years, he was brought back to France for re-trial. Although the case against him utterly broke down political considerations and "the honor of the army" demanded his conviction. He was found guilty of "treason but with extenuating circumstances," but was pardoned. The conviction and the pardon were alike a confession of the farcical nature of the proceedings. Where there is treason there can be no extenuating circumstances. Now after six years the case is re-opened, Dreyfus is acquitted and restored to his rank. But who shall restore to him the twelve years lost in shame and suffering under a false charge? But if he is a lover of his country he should not grudge the price he has paid, for he has helped to teach France that, in an affair of justice there is no safety except in rendering justice, and that nothing is ever settled until it is settled right.

A Curious Contract.

Mr. Bonaparte is an admirable man and an excellent secretary of the navy, but we think he has made a very curious contract for armor-plate for the two new battleships. When the bids were opened, it was found that the Midvale company (independent) bid $345 per ton; the Carnegie company (a branch of the steel trust) $370; and the Bethlehem company (another branch of the same) $380. Since the Midvale is a reliable firm which has done satisfactory government work before, the natural course would have been to give the contract to it as the lowest bidder. Then Mr. Schwab comes to Washington and, after conferences, the trust companies decide that they can afford to meet the price of their competitor and the contract is divided: one-half to the Midvale, the other half divided between the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies. Mr. Schwab said his companies needed the business. But why this anxiety to give the latter companies a share in the business when they were confessedly trying to get thirty or forty dollars a ton more than the job is really worth? Why should the bidders on any future contracts try to put their figures as low as possible if it is understood to be the government's policy to give the high bidders a chance to meet the low bidders' price and then give everybody a slice of the contract? Finally, when did any independent company ever get a chance to put in a second bid and get a share of the business when the trust was the lowest bidder? We fear that Secretary Bonaparte has inadvertently confused the functions of the different departments of this government. The protection of infant industries and full-fed trusts is cared for by the tariff law enacted by Congress and administered by the Treasury Department. The function of the secretary of the navy, so far as this job is concerned, is to buy armor-plate on the best terms as a business man would.

The Prosperity of Palestine.

It appears that the Holy Land is enjoying something of a commercial boom. A recent consular report suggests that the land is again enjoying a period of milk and honey. More specifically we observe that the district about Gaza exported two million bushels of barley last year, and over one-half a million dollars worth of oranges, the latter chiefly to Scotland; that the region of Jaffa (Joppa) raised nearly $100,000 worth of watermelons more than it needed for home use; that the Jewish colonies (think of "Jewish colonies" in Judea) are pushing the wine business; that the Jerusalem-Jaffa railroad is doing much to stimulate trade and custom-house receipts are steadily increasing. We note an increase in the importation of structural iron and other building materials, and woven goods and in the exportation of "religious goods." It is sad to note a falling off in the exports of sesame and colocynth. At the present writing, with no dictionary within reach, we do not know what colocynth is, but the combination sounds quite as good as "sesame and lilies," and it seems a pity that the supply of anything so musically named should be reduced. It should also be stated that the annual crop of tourists is steadily increasing.

The Voyage of The "Dewey."

The floating dry-dock "Dewey" has finished its long and perilous journey from Chesapeake Bay to the Philippine Islands. A floating dry-dock is not usually considered a highly seaworthy craft. The vast square tank, big enough to receive a large war vessel in its embrace and lift it clear out of water when its water-ballast is pumped out, was generally considered about as unwieldy an object in a storm as Noah's ark would have been. Besides, it had to be towed the entire twelve thousand miles, and towing a heavy craft in a rough sea is a perilous procedure. But the enterprise was skillfully and safely carried out. It took six and a half months. Twice in rough weather the tow lines parted and the helpless hulk was adrift without motive power. The route was by way of the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal. The establishment of this dry-dock in the Philippines will give the United States a very important piece of equipment in connection with a naval base if our navy is ever called into active service in the far east.

The Catalo.

Ever since civilization began to crowd the buffalo from their feeding grounds on the great wild plains into the limbo of extinct species, there has been talk of obtaining a valuable new domestic animal by crossing the buffalo with common cattle. Many experiments have been made without notable success. Now it is claimed that the thing has been accomplished, with most satisfying results. "Buffalo Jones," formerly game warden of the Yellowstone Park, asserts that a company with which he is connected has a herd of sixty "catalos." Their size is vast, their flesh is better than beef, their hides are more desirable than the finest buffalo robes, they are as hardy as wild-cats and as gentle as kittens, and they flourish just as well when left to shift for themselves on arid plains, winter and summer, as other cattle do under the most tender care and expensive feeding. This is an impressive list of virtues, offset by not one redeeming drawback to lend a priori probability to the report. But it may all be exactly true. Buffalo Jones says so.

The head of the National Petroleum Association lately declared that the Standard Oil Company's domination of the industry is at an end. It will still do a vast business, but there will be real competition on fair terms with the independents. The railroad rate bill and the new vigor in enforcing the anti-trust law will accomplish this, he says.

The Russian court-martial has acquitted Admiral Rojestvensky of the charge of treacherously or cowardly surrendering to the enemy, on the ground that he was not mentally responsible at the time of the surrender. Perhaps he may, on the same ground, be forgiven by the British for his North Sea blunder in firing on the fishing vessels. At the same court-martial, four other Russian officers were condemned to be shot but recommended to the Emperor's clemency.

The Function and Value of National Conventions.

The religious convention is an organ of religious freedom. It has no place in the scheme of ecclesiastical despotism. A Church with an infallible head from whose decision there is no appeal needs only a college of cardinals and a descending scale of an ecclesiastic hierarchy, to carry out its plans and accomplish its purposes. If at long intervals ecumenical councils are convened by a decree of the Pope, they are called to register decisions which have already been made, and to formally ratify dogmas which have already been agreed upon. It has no place for a representative body of delegates representing the churches to deliberate on matters of interest relating to the church and its work, and to express its own conclusions concerning these matters. The religious convention, in its modern sense, we repeat, is an adjunct, and an essential adjunct, of religious freedom.

Why do we say that the religious convention is an essential adjunct of religious liberty? Simply because, in the absence of any authoritative head or group of ecclesiastic officials, who have the authority to decide matters of practical interest, this work devolves upon the free churches themselves. Whatever is purely local can be decided upon by the local church, but there are many questions of great moment that interest a large number of local churches which have in them a common interest. Religious freedom and equality require that all the churches having an interest in such questions should have an opportunity to act upon them, either as churches or through chosen representatives who shall act for them. Experience has taught that where a large number of churches within a given district or state are interested in some question of importance to their welfare, the most practical method of dealing with such a question is through conventions or assemblies in which the churches, through their chosen representatives, have a voice. When the whole group of churches having common interests and common enterprises, is so great that a mass meeting of all the churches is impossible, then such a representative body becomes a necessity, if the principles of freedom and equality are to be maintained. Our form of government in this country is based upon the theory of representation in state and national legislatures.

Now, what is the theory as to the function of a religious convention among the Disciples of Christ? We have a number of interests which we generally group under the heads of Missions, Education, and Benevolence, which, in their very nature, require the co-operation of the churches. These conventions are county, state, and national, as we have generally adopted the political divisions of the country as convenient boundary lines for these separate conventions. While the same principle holds good in all, we are to consider here the function of the national convention among us. Besides the group of interests mentioned, missionary, education, and benevolent, there are certain moral and social reforms concerning which it has been customary for us to give an expression of judgment with the view of influencing public sentiment in what we believe to be the right direction. It has never been the theory, from the beginning of this Reformation, that these conventions possessed any legislative or disciplinary power. No creed has been formulated by any convention among us, and no man has been tried for alleged heresy. Our conventions have been neither law-making bodies nor courts of judicature. In this respect they differ from many of the national representative bodies, of our religious neighbors. Their action on all subjects is only advisory, never mandatory.

But let no one suppose that because the action of these conventions is enforced only by the moral power and influence of the men composing the convention and of the inherent rightness of the things they recommend, their function is, therefore, unimportant. Without interfering in the least with the freedom of the churches, and appealing only to their sense of duty and of brotherhood, large numbers have been brought into harmonious co-operation along many lines of general interest. Whatever progress we have made in missionary work, and in all our co-operative enterprises, is due very largely to these conventions. They have exerted a mighty unifying, educational, and inspirational influence without which our position and influence in the religious world would have been vastly different from what they are at present.

Hitherto, it has been the practice of these conventions under the direction of our great leaders to consider every question that was regarded as having an important bearing upon the welfare and progress of the cause for which we stand. There was a little shyness at first in admitting education and benevolence into the circle of subjects worthy to be considered in these national conventions, but at present we believe there is none who disputes their just claim to a place on our national program. From the beginning, however, there has been no dissent from the policy of bringing before such conventions overtures from various religious bodies looking toward Christian union, and nothing has created greater enthusiasm in these conventions than the report of conferences with other Protestant bodies having for their purpose the unification of Christians. Recently, however, for the first time in our history, objections have been raised against the consideration of this class of subjects in our national convention. This position has been taken by the opponents of church federation, who hold that the introduction of this question in our national convention is barred by the fact that our conventions are not legislative bodies. Others, however, not necessarily opposed to federation, are opposed to bringing the matter before what they call our missionary conventions, on the ground that they are not "germane" to the purposes of such conventions.

Neither of these objections seems to us well taken, for, as we have before pointed out, if the fact that our conventions are not legislative bodies makes it inadvisable for them to pass a resolution expressing its sentiment on the subject of federation as a method of co-operation, then the same fact would prevent them from passing any resolution expressing its sentiments on any other subject. As to germaneness, all precedents are against the objection. Our conventions are not simply missionary conventions and never have been, unless we interpret the word missionary in a very liberal way. That our colleges and our benevolent work do have a very close connection with our mission work cannot be denied; but they are not parts of it. And surely any action looking toward Christian union has a very important bearing upon the evangelization of the world. There is only one ground on which reasonable objection can be made against the consideration of the proposed basis of federation at our national conventions, and that is, that it would be inexpedient, at present, owing to the misunderstanding that prevails among brethren on this subject, and the injury that might accrue to our missionary interests through the unreasonable course of some brethren who hold our missionary societies, particularly the Home Society, responsible for any action taken by the convention!

As this situation exists, and especially if we are to grant the contention that nothing hereafter should be brought before our conventions but what is strictly missionary, we are face-to-face with a condition that calls for immediate action. If our present annual national conventions are to be understood as meetings of the missionary societies to transact only such business as is conducted by these organizations, then it does not need to be argued, that we must have a national convention, other than the missionary conventions, to consider other interests of vital importance to the brotherhood. This is the problem which we are now facing: We must either make our present national convocation the organ and instrument of expressing the collective thought of the brotherhood, on living questions which demand our attention, or we must organize a national council, or assembly or convention, broad enough in its scope and spirit, to deliberate upon every question and interest requiring the action of a deliberative body, and to adopt such recommendations and advisory measures, as may seem wise to such a body. It should be added, however, that this national council should be a strictly representative body in which every church caring to do so should have a voice.

We have simply stated the issue. Every thoughtful man among us knows that one or the other of the two alternatives which we have mentioned must be taken. Which shall it be?

Affection can withstand very severe storms of rigor, but not a long polar frost of downright indifference. Love will subsist on wonderfully little hope, but not altogether without it.

The Quest of Peace.

One of the supreme needs of the human soul, and, indeed, one of the supreme desires of the human heart, is peace. Who of us does not long for it, amid the tumult and strife of life, even as the "hart panteth after the water brooks"? What is peace? How can we define it when the Apostle tells us that it "passeth all understanding"? We may describe it, however, or mention some of its characteristics. It is repose of mind; rest of soul; freedom from carking cares and anxieties; satisfaction of heart; quietness of spirit. Peace is oneness with God; it is the correlation of the human spirit with the divine; it is undisturbed fellowship with God; it is the enfoldment of our trembling, fearful hearts, by the infinite love of God.

Whence cometh this peace? The world can not give it. Wealth can not purchase it. Earthly position and honor do not confer it. It is not a product of physical or intellectual struggle. How many, alas, are seeking it, unconsciously, perhaps, in all these ways, and are the same restless, unsatisfied mortals. Continents have been traversed, oceans crossed, long and weary pilgrimages made, in search of this precious boon, without finding it. Missionaries tell us of pilgrims in the far east traveling long distances on foot, in weariness of body and spirit, to find some sacred place or shrine where they may find peace. Poor, blind, deluded souls! But not more so than those in so-called Christian lands who are seeking satisfaction of soul in the struggle for earthly possessions, or in the race for earthly position or renown. Peace is the gift of God. Like the kingdom of God, of which it is a part, it is "not of this world." The best things of life are not purchasable; they are the free gifts of God.

When Jesus was about to leave the world he wished to make a bequest to his disciples. He had no houses or lands, no silver or gold, no wealth in any material form, to bequeath them. But he had something infinitely better than all material wealth to leave them, and so he said: "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you." What a precious legacy! No, indeed, the world does not give that way. It gives material wealth and worldly honor, but these do not bring rest to the soul. Only Christ can give us that. "My peace," said Jesus. This was the one possession that made his life serene and calm, through all the tumult and conflict which marked his earthly ministry. He wishes his disciples to share that peace with him. He desires to confer it upon them.

But this gift is not unconditional. God can not give to us any good thing until we are ready to receive it. We must believe in God, as he is revealed to us in Christ, and thoroughly commit ourselves to him in loving obedience to his will. In other words, we must trust him. The Psalmist had found the secret of this peace when he said, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose heart is stayed in thee." Living in conscious disobedience to the will of God forever bars the soul from this peace. Like every good thing, peace must be sought for. "Seek peace and pursue it." Seek it in obedience; in taking Christ's yoke and learning of him; in prayer and communion with God; in doing good to all men as you have opportunity; in walking humbly before God, in loving mercy, and doing justice.

Reader, have you found this peace? If not, search for it as for hidden treasures. But search in God's way, and not in the way of the world. It is a fruit of the Spirit. It will be found only as that divine Guest is admitted into your heart. Open your heart to his incoming, with all earnest longing and loving obedience and he will come in and thou shalt have peace. "And may the peace of God which passeth all understanding keep thy mind and heart through Jesus Christ."

Notes and Comments.

We are glad to give some space this week to the consideration of our Bible school interests. We feel it to be impossible to exaggerate the value of this part of our work. The new emphasis it is receiving within the last few years is a most hopeful sign. It stands to reason that our men and women in the church of to-morrow are to be just what the training of the boys and girls in our Bible school to-day will make them. We are, therefore, deciding the character of the future membership of the church and, therefore, the future destiny of the church, so far as human hands can shape it, by the manner in which we are fulfilling our duty to the children of to-day. The revival in Bible study which is so much needed as a factor in missionary, evangelistic, educational, and all other branches of our work, can only come through the Sunday or Bible school or, at least, its most effective work must be done there. It is the realization of this fact that is lending new interest to this subject, and it is for this reason that we devote this number of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST especially to that interest.

Bro. Herbert Yeuell's meeting in Manchester goes bravely on. Bravely is the right word. It is a heroic thing for a young man to enter a city like Manchester, without brethren, without friends, without acquaintances, and under suspicion that he represents some freak religion, to hold a series of religious services in the hot month of July in a down-town theater. And yet these meetings have grown in power from the beginning. Brother Yeuell has sent us clippings from a daily paper, and we have rarely seen as discriminating and well-written notices of a meeting in the daily press. Brother Yeuell's meeting is evidently the attraction of the city. The last clipping which we have seen says:

> Mr. Yeuell's sermons are growing in power and are appealing to the thinking elements. Some objections have been made to Mr. Yeuell's quiet and dignified manner of conducting his evangelistic work, but it is certainly an improvement on the style so often adopted by evangelists. Mr. Yeuell represents the newer school of evangelists. His scholarship stands unquestioned and his delivery and language are highly polished. His simple and natural manner is exceedingly winning.

The ministers are attending, and one of them said in the presence of a number of people, after the meeting the other night: "Mr. Yeuell is giving this city a series of such clear cut Biblical preaching as it has never received before." Brother Yeuell replied, "Then, doctor, why don't you preachers stand by me?" To which several responded: "Yes, yes!" The doctor blushed and departed with a "God bless you!" After a discourse the other evening on Biblical conversions he asked a Baptist minister, who was present, what was the difference between the Baptists and the Disciples, on the subject of conversion. "Nothing," responded the Baptist minister, "excepting in clear-cut crystal statement, in which the Disciples have the advantage." One evening last week he gave his first invitation and five persons responded. The Lord is certainly with the evangelist, and the old town of Manchester is receiving such a stirring up with the primitive Gospel as it has not received before. Judging from extracts in the papers from the sermons, Brother Yeuell is doing some plain, straight-forward preaching, the only kind that can prove effective in the east and west or any other section of the country. It would be a reproach upon us to allow this meeting to close before it was completed, for lack of funds to carry it on. A few hundred dollars are yet needed, and anything over and above the expense of the meeting, if there should be any, will be applied to the young mission church which we hope to establish.

Current Religious Thought.

The following from "The Christian Intelligencer" may help inculcate in us greater charity while reading the lives of the reformers. Their life work may be commemorated in part by a denominational organization, but we should be grateful that their "ruling ideas" led out of Rome and toward Jerusalem:

> Very frequently a service is done in obedience to an idea. An accepted truth becomes the pole-star of a life, and the man is the servant of a principle. All he does and says, as well as what he refrains from saying and doing, is explained by that chosen and ruling idea. All reformers have been so made and controlled. They were mostly men of one idea in the noble sense of being consecrated to a single, definite purpose. And one phase of Christian service takes on this form. It is obedience to an idea that is distinctively Christian, such an idea as that of help to the needy, or of purity of thought and life, or of peace between men and nations, or of that of which all these are but differing expressions—love. Whether intended for Christian service or not, all such activity that is impelled by devotion to a principle inculcated by Christ is so far Christian service and is entitled to recognition as such. Indeed all service that is really such has been under the domination of ideas that approximated Christ's more than those that had gone before. It is this point of view that makes the world's progress seem like a "Divine Processional."

Editor's Easy Chair.

PENTWATER MUSINGS.

"The Pioneer" is rapidly assuming the form of a house. The carpenters are at work on the roof to-day. Its broad verandas opening out westward, northward, southward, and each one commanding a view of the lake, have an inviting appearance. What a place for writing, reading, or resting according to one's mood! Meantime, however, we are using the trees about the cottage a good deal for shade and shelter. A few minutes ago a little bird lighted upon the limb of a tree within a few feet of us, and sat there contentedly for a minute or two, until it saw us, and then it flew away. Of course, this flight grew out of its ignorance as to our feeling of friendliness towards it. Had it known our fondness for birds, it would have lighted upon our hand, and we should have had a billing and cooing time of it. They tell us that in parts of the world where man has not intruded, that the birds and animals are perfectly tame with visitors who go there. They have not learned to distrust man and give him credit for harmlessness until he proves himself unworthy of it. What a pity that this primitive bond of social unity and friendship should have been broken up by man's cruelty! Birds are not different from man in this: that mutual confidence is the basis of friendship. The great social and religious union of men awaits a better acquaintanceship, and a more intimate knowledge among men of each other. The process which we call "taming" of animals, is simply a matter of getting their confidence and friendship, by showing them kindness. Even savages have been "tamed" in the same way, and we wouldn't wonder that after while, as our civilization advances, that laboring men and capitalists, and even members of different churches, would learn to adopt this method of "taming" each other! That would be a great gain over war between nations, industrial strife between labor and capital, and religious strife between brother and brother.

The amount of mail that reaches us here shows that Pentwater is very accessible by mail! The variety of an editor's mail makes his life anything but monotonous. Some letters complain, some criticise, some ask for information, many ask for assistance in one way and another, and now and then a royal soul just sits down and writes a word of encouragement, having no favors to ask nor faults to find. We read in a religious paper, the other day, the statement of a man who said he had been preparing the Sunday-school lesson sixteen years for a certain religious journal, and he had never received a word of appreciation of any help he had given, from the readers of that paper, during all these years! And yet if this faithful worker had made a slip in his theology, he would probably have heard from a great many, so prone are people to take for granted what pleases them, and to speak out only when their views are crossed. One of the very best letters we have received during the past week came from the prison. You can't judge of the quality of a letter by the place it comes from. This man's imprisonment, like that of many another man, has proved a blessing to him, for he has learned to know God in the state prison, as he had not known him while he was at liberty. It is vastly better to be a Christian in prison than a willful sinner at liberty. How little we know what environment is best for us! We are indebted to Paul's imprisonment for some of his greatest epistles, and but for Bedford jail we probably should never have heard of "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress." But we were speaking about letters, and what a great variety of them one receives. How much they mean, too, in the way of burdening or brightening one's life! Some days wear a somber hue through all its hours of sunshine, because the morning mail brought letters which have excited anxiety. Some time, of course, such letters are necessary, but let each of us think well before we add an ounce of burden to any man whose load may already be as much as he can carry.

The past week has been a succession of glorious summer days with the exception of one rainy day, which was the most needed of all. The bathing in Lake Michigan has been such as to tempt one to become an aquatic animal, and live in the lake! The sunsets have vied with each other in magnificence and grandeur. One of these was exceptionally fine. It was as if the sun and the lake and the clouds and the atmosphere had held a council and had said, "Go to, now; let us present a scene at this evening's sunset that will hold a place in the memory of all who shall behold it." And they did. It was a glorious picture, consisting of many parts. There were long strata of clouds on fire, and there were opalescent lakes and golden waterfalls, and rivers of molten lava, flowing down dark mountain sides, and leaping into the abyss. In the midst of the picture, and the center of attraction, was the great sun, belted here and there with dark clouds dividing it into zones, now peeping with his blazing eye through a rift in the vapor, and all the while sending up golden shafts of light to paint in crimson and gold the clouds which constituted his retinue. What a scene for a painter! But no; no painter would attempt to put on canvas a scene like that. It was one of the masterpieces of the divine Artist. Such a sunset scene reminds one of the words of the psalmist: "In them (the heavens) hath He set a tabernacle for the sun." Surely no tabernacle ever erected by man could equal the gorgeous splendor and magnificent proportions of that one reared in the heavens as if by magic on that glorious evening.

Pentwater has a young Christian church organized since our last summer's sojourn here, and we have had the privilege of meeting with it and speaking for it since our coming, in its Lord's day morning services, held in the G. A. R. hall of the town. These services have increased in attendance as the visitors from abroad are gathering here for the summer. Last Lord's day we had with us L. C. Stow and wife of Grand Rapids, who were with us on a transient visit. We hope they will come again and stay longer. Brother Alderman of Pentwater, brother of our missionary who laid down his life for the cause in Mexico, is the leader of the little band of Disciples here who are waiting now the arrival of their preacher, Brother Shonts. We are hoping, as the number of visitors increases here, to have an evening beach service. The morning boat, "The Kansas," which makes tri-weekly trips from Chicago, brought Bro. A. H. Duncan and wife and daughter from St. Louis, who have joined their other married daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Rogers, at the club house. Like everybody else who comes here they are charmed with the beauty and quietness of the place. In thinking over the future of this park we have thought how desirable it would be to have a number of our ministers and business men gather here each summer, not only for rest and physical recuperation, but to counsel together over matters of interest to the brotherhood and to hold some devotional religious services, and to have some Bible studies, in a quiet informal way, that would be wonderfully stimulating and helpful. We have felt the need, sorely, during the past week, of just such wise counselors with whom we could talk over some of the current questions that involve our present and future welfare. This is the ideal which we have in mind, and which led us to this place of peace and quiet.

In a letter a few days ago from a very dear friend who is himself now enjoying a vacation in the east, he says: "Has not the time come in your life when you can have some absolute rest—a real vacation?" We used to dream of such a time, in the long ago, but we hardly expect it now, until it is forced upon us by inability to work. Never in the Editor's whole history has he ever had the luxury of such a vacation. We have often wondered how it would feel to be free from any sense of obligation to perform daily stints of editorial work—to grind out the necessary "copy." The summer vacation, with us, means the removal of our editorial office from St. Louis to the lakeside. But we advise all who can do so to leave their work at home and take a full vacation. The intensity of our American life makes a vacation a real necessity in the lives of most men. The summer resort is really a beneficent institution, and to get people away from their ruts and routine of daily toil and drudgery, to a summer resort, where Nature presents some of her noblest aspects, and where scenes and associations are all-new, is to confer upon them a benefit which will be life-long in its influence. It is a blessed arrangement that Memory stores up and carries with us these pictures that delight the eye and fascinate the soul, and they become permanent assets, and we live over again, by means of these pictures, the pleasant experiences of the past. The prospect is that August will be a very full month on this beach. Among other visitors we are expecting within the next few days Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Moore, of Columbia. Of course, we will settle a good many difficult theological problems during the summer!

By F. D. Power

It is a thousand miles across the Mediterranean in a northwesterly direction from Alexandria to Naples, but a pleasant journey after the summer heat and dust of Egypt. Passing through the straits of Messina we had excellent views of Mt. Etna towering 10,742 feet, the loftiest volcano in Europe. It has not been active since 1892, but generally has an eruption every four or five years, and in one case destroyed forty towns and between 600,000 and 100,000 lives. At the northern end of the straits we steamed between Scylla and Charybdis. According to Homer the rock of Scylla was a roaring and voracious sea-monster, a beautiful virgin above, a monster with a wolf's body and a dolphin's tail below, and in connection with Charybdis opposite, fraught with imminent danger to mariners. Currents and eddies here are very rapid and the channel very narrow and it is easy to see the origin of the proverb: "Incidis in Scyllum, cupiens vitare Charybdis." A little farther on we looked upon the dark form of Stromboli—Stromboli where Aeolus had his home, and from whose crater the crusaders claimed they could hear the lamentations of the lost in Purgatory.

The traveller who approaches Naples by sea may well be excused for any extravagance of language. As the ship enters the bay, passing between the beautiful isles of Ischia and Capri placed like twin outposts to guard the entrance of this watery Paradise, the scene is one that cannot fade from memory. All around stretches the bay in its azure immensity, its sweeping curves bounded on the right by the rocky promontory of Sorrento with its towns and villages, olive-clad precipices, orange groves and vineyards. Then Vesuvius, the genius of the scene, with its vine clad slopes below and dark cone above, belching out fire and smoke. Farther along, the great city of 600,000, a white mass in the distance like a marble quarry, and far beyond a range of snowy peaks of the Abruzzi mountains in the purple haze of the horizon. It is a panorama for beauty and extent which one sees nowhere else, an unequaled combination of sea, mountain, and island scenery. Vedi Napoli e poi mori! they say, "see Naples and die," and Goethe declares a man can never be utterly miserable who retains the recollection of it.

The city has its history. The Romans loved it. Lucullus had his gardens here and Virgil wrote his poetry here and has his resting place near by; and Augustus often resided at Naples, and Sallust had his home at the foot of Vesuvius. The modern city is not attractive. One is soon disillusionized by filth and dirt, vulgarities and indecencies, beggars and noise, drivers, street vendors, and guides. The poetry vanished with the vision of maccaroni eaters. Men and women make their toilet in the street, and one sees many things to justify the proverb, "Naples is a paradise inhabited by devils." There are many interesting street scenes. There is the fried-fish stall, where the oil cooks the trout, prepared while you wait. There is the snail soup shop where present day Neopolitans devour these little creatures as did their Roman ancestors. There are the perambulant living dairies—the cow or the goat, driven to your door, or mounting your steps to deliver the goods. There are the lemonade sellers with the barrels on their backs and lemons strung to their waists, dispensing drink to the thirsty at two cents a glass. There are the long bodied wagons with the richly decorated pad or saddle of the harness having a brilliant array of gaudy brass flags and shining repousse plates with figures of the Madonna and the saints, which, with the pagan symbols of horns and crescents are supposed to protect the horses from harm. These ornaments, however, do not seem to save them from the brutality of their masters. Nowhere does one see such loads put upon the teams. The carrying power of a horse seems only limited by the number of passengers that can hang on to a vehicle, and the whip is used unmercifully.

The sights in Naples are not notable. The museum is most frequented. People who do not care for an aquarium, and the "galleria" where women buy coral and Mosaics and cameos at big prices, find great comfort in the collections of statuary and treasures from the buried city of Pompeii. The ancient frescoes from Pompeii, Herculaneum, and other cities and the collection of marbles and bronzes of terra cottas and papyri, of gems and vases gathered from the excavations of the disinterred cities are exceedingly rich and instructive. One sees bread baked since the year 79, and fruit, and even the forms of men and animals, buried under the ashes of Vesuvius over eighteen centuries ago. Among the treasures of the museum is the famous Farnese bull and Hercules. The first is the most celebrated. It is a marvellous group of figures hewn out of a single block of marble. It was found in the Thermae of Caracella at Rome. The two sons of Antiope, Amphion and Zethus, avenge their mother by binding Dirce, who had treated her with greatest cruelty for many years, to the horns of a wild bull. Antiope in the background exhorts them to forgiveness. The group is unrivalled. It has wonderful boldness and life. Its figures are all life size and tell their story in most vivid manner.

After all, the best things in Naples are outside. Capri is here with its famous blue grotto which everybody goes to see, and too often fails to be realized as the narrow entrance cannot be entered, or the visitor is slushed and half drowned by the sea. Entering the portal on your back, "you find yourself transported to a world of wavering subaqueous sheen. The grotto is domed in many chambers; and the water is so clear that you can see the bottom, silvery, with black-finned fishes diapered upon the blue-white sand. All around the spray leaps up with living fire, and when the oars strike the surface it is as if a phosphorescent sea had been smitten and the drops ran from the blades in blue pearls. The spectators seem bathed in liquid sapphire." Many, however, take the trip, get sea sick, and never get in, or, if they do, come home drenched in very prosaic fashion.

The event of my visit to Naples was the ascension of Vesuvius. The mountain is now in eruption. Volumes of smoke and flame, of scoriae and red hot lava are issuing from its cone. Many feared to make the ascent. It looks angry enough and might at any time do something unusual, but the only time to ascend Vesuvius is when it "works." When it is "working" it is most interesting. The hoary old mountain is a majestic figure on the landscape.

BACK TO PULPIT
What Food Did for a Clergyman.

A minister of Elizabethtown tells how Grape-Nuts food brought him back to his pulpit: "Some 5 years ago I had an attack of what seemed to be La Grippe which left me in a complete state of collapse and I suffered for some time with nervous prostration. My appetite failed, I lost flesh till I was a mere skeleton, life was a burden to me, I lost interest in everything and almost in every body, save my precious wife.

"Then on the recommendation of some friends I began to use Grape-Nuts food. At that time I was a miserable skeleton, without appetite and hardly able to walk across the room; had ugly dreams at night, no disposition to entertain or be entertained and began to shun society.

"I finally gave up the regular ministry, indeed I could not collect my thoughts on any subject, and became almost a hermit. After I had been using the Grape-Nuts food for a short time I discovered that I was taking on new life and my appetite began to improve; I began to sleep better and my weight increased steadily; I had lost some 50 pounds but under the new food regime I have gained almost my former weight and have greatly improved in every way.

"I feel that I owe much to Grape-Nuts and can truly recommend the food to all who require a powerful rebuilding agent, delicious to taste and always welcome." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. A true natural road to regain health, or hold it, is by use of a dish of Grape Nuts and cream morning and night. Or have the food made into some of the many delicious dishes given in the little recipe book found in pkgs.

Ten days' trial of Grape-Nuts helps many. "There's a reason."

Modern Religious Persecution---A Defense

2. Its Methods.

The methods of the persecutor in mediaeval times were coarse and uncouth, and obliged him to lay hands upon the person of the heretic. That was before printing had been invented or the religious newspaper had been heard of. The first religious newspaper was not published in America until about 1809. Before the days of religious newspapers heretics were roughly arrested and dragged in person against their will before a court of accusers and judges. That is all changed now. The person of the heretic is not touched; he is put to no inconvenience in being obliged to attend his own trial; he loses no time, and nothing else except, perhaps, a little sleep; because a newspaper in a distant city carries on the trial and bears all the expenses of prosecutors, witnesses, judges and jury. What more could the accused ask? And yet there are people who object to it.

Trial and punishment by newspaper is the only civilized method of persecution. It has more of the qualities of the Christian spirit than any other method that was ever tried. It is a genuinely painless method. It is especially successful with professors. This is how it ranks: If a persecutor discovers a teacher in one of the colleges teaching false doctrine, all that is necessary to silence him is to write up a good, strong description of his heresy for the paper and make sure that copies of the paper shall be thickly scattered in the state from which the college obtains its support. The people who have been contributing to the support of the college see the charges against the professor, and at once write to the authorities of the school withdrawing their contributions until the professor has been dismissed from the faculty. It may take some time before the authorities can close the contract with the teacher and drop him from the teaching force, but it usually succeeds.

Besides withholding their contributions patrons remove their children from the school, as a means of effecting its purification. The professor is finally obliged to withdraw from the college and go to preaching, or farming, or selling life insurance, for no other college dare take him up. Thus heresy is checked and punished, and no one suffers. But some one objects and says: The professor is made to suffer. He may have spent a life time preparing himself for teaching; and the persecution has ruined his acceptance as a teacher. The answer to such an objection is very simple; persons are not to be respected when truth is at stake. To have retained that man as teacher would have meant the corrupting of the minds of many young men, some of whom were, doubtless, preparing themselves for the ministry. His errors would thus have been scattered and propagated to the destruction of many souls. Some of the young men contemplating the ministry would thus be shown how dangerous and fatal error is, and would be deterred from entering the ministry with such ideas. It would be better to have no ministry than to have one that thinks contrary to the way the "rank and file" of the brethren think. Who pays young men for preaching? Are they paid to preach what they think, or what most of the brethren think the Bible teaches? By the sacrifice of one professor many young men are warned away from the ministry, who would enter it to their sorrow with ideas of their own.

As evidence that God is well pleased with the newspaper method of persecution, he prospers the newspapers that adopt it. All things work together for good to those that love God's truth, and are willing to risk their all in defence of it. No one has better claim to the divine favor than those who persecute the enemies of God's truth. If any one were wanting further proof of the divine approval upon the modern method of persecution, let it be known that all colleges, missionary societies and papers that have condoned the infidelities opposed in the persecution by refusing to join in it, or by giving aid and comfort to the accused, have had a struggle for existence, while others have prospered beyond all past experience. The most faithful and zealous newspaper persecutor is said to have had its subscription list doubled in the five or more years of its crusade against heresy; while its Sunday-school supplies have increased in use in a corresponding degree. The unselfish devotion of this newspaper to the faith once for all delivered to the saints, won the sympathy and co-operation of many advertisers of patent medicines—of catarrh, pile, rheumatism, cancer, dyspepsia, kidney, stomach, consumption, liver, bowel, heart, headache, eye, ear, nose and throat, female complaint, bladder, anti-fat and nerve cures and remedies. Many gold mining companies, lumber companies, oil companies and rubber plantation companies, officered by pastors and evangelists, paid for entire pages of advertisements that they might show the infidel and heretic how the Lord careth for his own. Even some colleges that could scarcely afford it had standing advertisements of their courses of study.

When many of the "leading men of the brotherhood" in the pastorates of city churches turned away from the paper and the truth, God stirred up his true servants, the men of humble positions and of low college degrees, who were baptizing more souls than all the city preachers put together, to come to the help of the paper against the infidel, they all subscribed for it and urged their members to subscribe for it. Evangelists and pastors of town and country churches preached against the infidel and the critic. A great cloud of witnesses rose up from the farms and fields and said with a loud voice: "Go on;" "you are right;" "hit it on the head;" "cry aloud and spare not;" "fire the big guns;" "stand pat;" "you are flat-footed and square-toed upon the Word of God;" "send it (the paper) across the sea; the heathen need it;" "my eyes have been opened;" "send me some sample copies." I copy these words from the paper itself.

These are but a few of the many words of commendation that fairly burdened the mail bags. After reading these commendations of persecution from "brethren tried and true," who can longer doubt that God is on the side of the

DIDN'T BELIEVE

That Coffee Was the Real Trouble.

Some people flounder around and take everything that's recommended but finally find that coffee is the real cause of their troubles. An Oregon man says:

"For 25 years I was troubled with my stomach. I was a steady coffee drinker but didn't suspect that as the cause. I took almost anything which someone else had been cured with but to no good. I was very bad last summer and could not work at times.

"On Dec. 2, 1902, I was taken so bad the doctor said I could not live over 24 hours at the most and I made all preparations to die. I could hardly eat anything, everything distressed me and I was weak and sick all over. When in that condition coffee was abandoned and I was put on Postum, the change in my feelings came quickly after the drink that was poisoning me was removed.

"The pain and sickness fell away from me and I began to get well day by day so I stuck to it until now I am well and strong again, can eat heartily, with no headache, heart trouble or the awful sickness of the old coffee days. I drink all I wish of Postum without any harm and enjoy it immensely.

"This seems like a strong story but I would refer you to the First Nat'l Bank, The Trust Banking Company, or any merchant of Grant's Pass, Ore., in regard to my standing, and I will send a sworn statement of this if you wish. You can also use my name." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Still there are many who persistently fool themselves by saying "Coffee don't hurt me." A ten days' trial of Postum in its place will tell the truth and many times save life. "There's a reason."

The Manchester Meeting

By Herbert Yeuell

For two weeks I have borne the critical scrutiny of these oft-deceived people and they are only just beginning to take me seriously as a minister of our common Lord, instead of some religious eccentric. To have said on the start that I had come to organize a new church would have killed the movement outright.

The ministers have been attentive and frequent in their attendance and have resorted to many legitimate schemes to discover my purpose. The leading Baptist minister invited me to preach in his, the largest church of that denomination in the state, and in introducing me at considerable length told his people that I am a Disciple of Christ, here for what purpose he knew not, whether to organize a new church he knew not, but he was glad to say that my people are orthodox and evangelical and that so far my preaching was eminently evangelical and straightforward. Not having myself informed the people of my religious standing this reverend gentleman, perhaps fearing that I might do so blunderingly, relieved me of that sometime necessity.

In some states my position would not be peculiar but here it is exceedingly unique and delicate. This is New England and we have not a Disciple in the city that has come to light yet. This is a city with other New England cities where men of international reputation have utterly failed. Dr. John Robertson, the famous Scotch preacher, who was backed by all the evangelical churches, closed a two weeks' campaign with an almost empty house, and not a convert. The people here are opposed violently to evangelists and revivals.

Observing this feature of New England religious thought, I have "lectured" each night and so far have not extended an invitation. Consequently the curiosity of the city is aroused and my audiences, small at first, have grown steadily, and last night I addressed over one thousand of Manchester's representative people.

I have no choir. My soloist is Mrs. Susan Brooke Rutherford of Pittsburg, and our pianist Mr. James Hubbard of Haverhill, Mass.

I have preached our plea of the New Testament in every address, but always refrained from giving it a denominational flavor, consequently scores of people are studying the Bible, as, I believe, never before. It will require a long campaign to win these slow New Englanders even after they are convinced.

One condition which, while a reason for rejoicing will make it the more difficult to establish our cause, is the general good feeling among the preachers and the churches. So little sectarian sentiment is there that they do not in many instances designate their churches by denomination other than the street or district of their location. This will make it exceedingly difficult in drawing distinctions and teaching the gospel systematically to avoid the appearance of a narrow sectarianism in ourselves and plea.

At this point let me say that the pastor of the leading Congregational church in New Hampshire and by far the leading church in Manchester, was formerly one of our ministers. Before I arrived he informed one of the leading preachers that he left us because we are "a narrow sectarian body always harping on baptism and teaching baptismal regeneration." This, of course, coming from such a source makes it exceedingly difficult to preach the plea without being misunderstood and also keeps the preachers on their guard and suspicious.

This is really the most difficult situation before us in establishing the work. A disputatious or polemical meeting at this time would, I believe, forever ruin our plea for Christian union. Such a meeting might appeal to certain of the baser sort of the Holy Roller type, but it would never touch the real New England.

I am therefore inclined to the idea, and more so on studying the methods of Christian Scientists and Unitarians who are plentiful here, that the only really successful way to establish a church here will be to continue my present method and have an organizer follow up the work.

It is my purpose, however, to draw the net at the proper time and discover all who may be inclined to accept "this way," and before leaving to be satisfied in my own mind as to the prospects of a permanent work here.

This campaign led by the writer will have to be conducted on a high and broad plane, distinctively irenic and entirely minus that quality so common among us, the tone evangelistic. It is well known to the brethren generally that the writer has tackled several very knotty problems in conservative places but he is free to state at this stage that this New England problem presents the very opposite of all the problems and more difficult than all the others combined. It is like starting inside out, or upside down. Everything is different, demanding a reversal of the usual evangelistic traditions among us.

It is very well to say that meetings of the usual type have been held in the east, but they have not been in New England. It is one thing to hold a meeting with a live church and a live pastor with two or three thousand dollars at disposal and scores of workers, but it is another thing to hold a meeting in a stuffy, hot theatre, too hot for successful theatricals, without an usher, no one but volunteers each night from the audience to lift the offering, no choir and every bit of advertising done by the licensed man, because first, there are no workers, and second, because the law forbids promiscuous advertising.

A tent or a tabernacle here would be torn to pieces by the foreign element or else be the legitimate stamping ground for every sort of religious idiot of which New England is full.

Our audiences are remarkable and I am full of hope that many will embrace the plea for Christian unity. So long as we can keep the campaign on a broad plan it will attract the thinking people, but if from lack of funds we have to take small quarters I fear we may fail of our object. New England collections are proverbially small.

Let it be remembered that I have not one person to call upon for the smallest service. Your prayers and your subscriptions are sadly needed.

The Newest Evangelism[*]

By George Hamilton Combs

The evangelization of the world is the supreme business of the church.

The church is an army; its buildings barracks; its preaching words of command; its Bibles swords; its music battle-music. We are soldiers, Christian soldiers, marching as to war.

> "One army of the living God,
> To his commands we bow."

And that command is, "Go everywhere and evangelize all."

Yet how often have we missed the meaning of it all. He was walking, a plain American, through a great cathedral, a noble pile, pride of a church, that, in Emerson's tooth-sharp words, declares that not by works nor yet by grace but by taste are we saved. Crushed and humbled by its splendors, its immensities, a great awe possessed his soul. Turning to the guide he innocently asked "Do they have many conversions in this church?" "Conversion" —the guide haughtily drew himself up— "Conversions, do you think this is a Wesleyan chapel?" Yet this is the viewpoint of many. The church finds its end in the erection of a beautiful temple. The end of the army is the barracks!

Or it may be the centrality of meaning is found in the preacher. He is eloquent. Song birds nest in his throat and his speech is the witchery of cadenced music. "Have you heard Dr. Black?" asks the awe struck multitude. The mission of the church is the exploitation of the preacher. The army is called into being that it may hear a speech! Now, I do not underrate the orator. He has his place. The church waits upon his words. But his words must be words that rouse to action, words with the thrill of fife and trumpet, hammer-words, that on conscience anvils pound to shape and use the solemn vows of men. The eloquence that lulls to slumber is a prostituted gift.

Nor does the church exist for the sake of music and the splendor of form and ritual. Outward and spectacular exhibits should never blind us to the real meaning and mission of the church. That mission is the evangelization of the world. All Christian agencies are means to this end. For this all prayers, all sermons, all books, all newspapers, for this all assemblies and conventions.

But what as to procedure, method, agency?

The Old Evangelism.

This term stands for a certain definite well known religious force and method. It is the evangelism of Finney, of Whitfield, of Moody. It is the evangelism associated with great crowds, stirring songs and spiritual raptures and exhilarations. It is the evangelism with the well known machinery and expedients of decision cards, enquiry meetings and strenuous altar-appeal. It is the evangelism with strong insistence upon verbal and mechanical inspiration of the scriptures, the sovereignty of God, the passivity of man in soul transformations, the work of special and supernatural agencies in conversion, hard and forensic interpretations of the atonement. What shall we say of it? That as a system of truth it has been outgrown, and as a method, outworn. It does not dovetail into the needs of today. In a word the old evangelism is wholly out of accord with the modern temper (and even in its transformation of content and presentation by our own preachers leaves much still to be desired.)

And yet this in justice ought to be said: with all its limitations, artificialities and truth obscurations this old evangelism has been the life of the church and that the growth of the church has been in exact correspondence with the emphasis laid upon evangelistic enterprise. With all its imperfections this discredited evangelism cannot be sneered out of court. The growth of any denomination can be determined by its evangelistic zeal.

But is there not a better agency and method? The need has been met, we are told. We have

The New Evangelism.

The term is freshly minted. It is attractive. What shall we think of it? Frankly at the very outset I wish to confess my disappointment in this large sounding term. Much there is of good in the so-called new evangelism, but the good is the old; the new is the untrue. That which is said to specially characterize it does not commend itself to my judgment. What are its distinguishing marks?

1. It is sociological, rather than theological. This word sociological is quite imposing and of Goliath bulk. But what is the meaning of this utterance? Does it mean that man should consider man? If so it is no new thing. It has been preached from the beginning. Love for one's neighbor has been declared from all pulpits. Does it mean more—as we suspect—that man's duties all relate to man and that the Godward side of obligation is of no great concern? Then it is both shallow and false. Man must look Godward as well as manward, must look up as well as out. Indeed the quickening sense of brotherly obligation and responsibility must come from communion with the invisible God and our hands will never go out in helpfulness to our brother until they have first gone up in prayer to our Father. The sociology of the new evangelism may have the breadth of the earth but it needs also the depth of the sea and the heights of the heavens.

2. It is not only sociological but it is ethical, we are told, ethical rather than emotional.

Pray tell when was evangelism other than ethical? Who could more earnestly plead for a true life than Finney? What doctor of the new school has ever more strongly insisted on the need of a changed life than Dwight L. Moody?

3. The new evangelism we are told is the salvation of the whole man and not the salvation of his soul. This sounds well and for its emphasis upon the need of right environment for the individual and the need of a ministry both to body and to the mind is to be commended and yet again there comes the inevitable conclusion that this is not new and that we are simply dealing with new terminologies rather than with new truths.

So far I repeat as I understand the new evangelism I am not greatly enamored of it. I object to it

1. For its indefiniteness. What the old evangelism is you know, what the new is, you can only guess. We meet with new names and old faces and lose ourselves in the glitter of generalities.

2. I object to it because of its would-be substitution of cultural for conversion agencies. It shies at the word salvation; it makes much of the word culture. Now we cannot get rid of that word salvation. We are sinners all and our great need is not that we shall be cultured but that we shall be saved, When you can sweeten the Atlantic with rosewater you may save the world through culture, when the culturist can change the leopard's spots then may he change the human heart.

3. The new evangelism lacks earnestness. It is dilettanteism in pulpit and in pew; it lives and moves and has its being in the realm of the aesthetic. Its boast is that the old time enthusiast, the barnstormer in religion is gone. Gone? The enthusiast gone? Then the church is gone or going. Heat is life. The frozen stream turns no mill, the frozen earth grows no grain. The men who have profoundly moved the world have been men of burning enthusiasm, of lava words and heart. Such a one was Xavier with his cry "more, more," more souls for the Lord Christ.

4. I object to the new evangelism because it is an evangelism that does not evangelize. Its record is a record of nonaccomplishment. Its sweet placidities can never stir the world. The advocates of the new evangelism preach to no mighty throngs, they minister at no crowded altars, they turn no cities upside down. As well expect an arc light to wake to harvest the seeds that slumber in the soil as the occupant of this velvety throne of aestheticism to come to the sovereignty of human hearts.

The Newest Evangelism.

There is a more excellent way: The way of the newest which is also the oldest evangelism. And this way? The gathering of the children into our Bible schools and through the instrumentality of decision days, never less frequent than monthly, winning them to the acknowledgment of Christ as Lord. Do you say all this we have known and tried? We have not tried it. We have never as yet come to any adequate realization of the boundless possibilities of this evangelism. We think nothing of expending a thousand dollars in a revival that revives for a month, but what churches among us have put a like sum in the upbuilding of its Bible school with the direct purpose of winning the children to Christ? Not one!

I. Consider first of all the effects of this newest evangelism upon the content of our glorious evangel. What will be the character of the preaching in our Bible schools and how will this method affect the gospel thus declared? The audience is half creator of every sermon. What then will be the effect of this child-audience upon the preacher and his message? Broadly it will be to create a preached theology that missing alike the hardness and the unloveliness of the old theology on the one hand and the vagueness and the shallowness of a new theology on the other shall be temperate, scriptural, wholesome, true.

1. It will insure an affirmative gospel. No man comes before such hearers with guess and hypothesis, doubt and the frippery of dream. Here is no place for conjectures but for certainties. No man who is half a man will weave a mist of doubt around a boy or girl.

2. It would be simple. When the preacher stands before boys and girls he will find himself inevitably emphasizing the few great elementary truths of that gospel. What pulpit, pray, would venture to air his learning and his speculations before such an audience? May I say this? That which cannot be preached to children ought not to be preached to adults.

3. It will be pictorial. This was the way of Christ. His sermons are pictures. In all his recorded utterances you will look in vain for the barrenness of abstractions. Everywhere is the glory of color and movement of life. The profoundest truths of heaven are presented in simple stories easy to the apprehension of children. Let us follow him. Stand before young people and you will learn his method. You must not argue, you must paint.

4. It will be an evangel of light and love. No other evangel fits into the Bible school hour. All hard doctrines veil their faces in the presence of the child. There is not a living man who could preach the doctrine of unconditional election before a Bible school. The picture of an angry God would scorch the fingers of any man who should attempt to bring it before children. There and then it must be as it was at the beginning, the evangel of life and hope and love. Good news to the child mind is good news and not the terrifying pictures of hell. Now that this must profoundly influence our preaching is unquestioned. What radical changes would be wrought! How lonesome our theological gladiators and heresy hunters would feel in a Bible school.

II. Consider its effect upon the Bible school. This newest evangelism solves all the problems of the school.

1. It solves the initial problem how to increase the attendance of the Bible school. There is no magnet so powerful as evangelism both for the old and the young. How to have a big school? The answer is not in card and banners and orchestras and machinery—the answer is in evangelization.

2. It solves the problem of how to hold. Children by the thousands drop out of our schools every year; we get but do not keep. Why? There is no fervor and stir of evangelism. No school that is not a recruiting station for Christ can ever hold a child. Thousands of boys and girls drift into our schools every year. We make no special effort to have them decide for Christ; in a little while they drift into other schools or more likely out of the reach of all Christian influences. But convert them, then it is our church and our Bible school and they stay. Bad as it is, awful as it is, I can but believe that even so great a heretic as J. H. Garrison may federate with whomsoever he will and yet through the great mercies of God be saved—though as by fire; it is the heresy of indifference to the youth of our land. Eighty per cent of young men and women from our Protestant families have at some time in their lives been in our Bible schools. The majority of these have drifted away; they are no longer in our Bible schools or our churches. Why? In the critical time when they were in our schools we failed to take advantage of a heaven-sent opportunity to induce them to decide for Christ.

3. It solves the problem of how to unify the school. There is a painful lack of unity in our schools. They are lacking in coherence, in orderliness, in esprit de corps. We have sought to bring this about through the use of uniform lessons. This is a step but it is not a long one. Help it gives in attaining a mild type of general unity but locally is does little. A longer step and a wiser is the establishment of the teachers training department. This is foundational and absolutely necessary. All teacher training and all drill and all method is for the sake of (1) making Christians of all who are not Christians; (2) making better Christians of those who are Christians and that not simply for their own sakes, but that they may preach the gospel to others.

4. It will solve the problem of how to spiritualize your school. How sore this problem is! The most discouraging lack of our schools is the lack of the one essential thing—spirituality. Enlist them in evangelism and out of that kindled zeal and out of that deepening consecration will they put away unworthy things as surely as the awakened life in the tree pushes off the old dead leaf with the growing life of the leaf to be. Better than the dynamite of rebuke is the flame of love.

III. Consider this newest evangelism solely as an evangelistic agency and method.

1. It commends itself to us in that it augments the number of evangelists. This is our great need—the need of workers. Evangelistic forces are pitiably inadequate for the task. It is now as in the olden times, the harvest is great but—oh the shame of it and the pity of it—the laborers are few. This newest, which is, as I said at the beginning, the oldest evangelism, increases the number of workers. The curse of the church of to-day is professionalism. The preacher is the evangelist—he alone. But this newest evangelism restores the so-called laity to its place of

The Jacksonville-Paris Contest

From Jacksonville View Point.
C. L. Depew, Superintendent.

The Bible schools of the churches at Jacksonville and Paris, Ill., held a friendly contest in attendance and offerings for six months, ending the last Sunday in June.

The Paris school had an average attendance during the entire six months of about forty-eight more than Jacksonville. The average offering at Jacksonville was about $8.50 larger than at Paris.

In 1905 our average attendance was 300 and our offerings were $900. During the second quarter the average was 350. During the second quarter of 1906 our average attendance was 706, and our average offering was $60.95. Our highest attendance prior to January 1, 1906, was 513.

We had planned to make 1906 a great year, as the equipment for Bible school work was complete in our new building, giving ample room for a school of 1,000, and we had already determined to do our best to fill the new church, when the challenge came from the Paris school asking us to meet them in the six months' contest. We accepted the challenge at once, and will ever be grateful to the Paris school and its workers for the new life which came to us through the contest.

The first efforts were made to increase the interest and attendance at our teachers' meetings. We were having an attendance of from 15 to 20. After adopting the angle method the attendance increased to 35 and up. We were having few occasions to call for substitutes, as in four months, we did not have more than two teachers absent on any one Sunday and many times every teacher was present. Needless to say this splendid work on the part of the teachers had its effect on the rest of the school, and on February 18 we had an attendance of 516.

On the first Sunday of 1906 the announcement was made that we would have an attendance of 600 on dedication day, and an offering of $200, and we surpassed both of these in the old building.

We determined to have our missionary rally on the first Lord's day in March, and although March 4 was cold and stormy we had an attendance of 421 with an offering of $200.10.

April 8 we had a building fund rally, 488 present, offering $129.68. We were now making our plans for dedication day, April 29. We prepared a card for members of the school to get their friends to fill out and sign and to return to the secretary. The card stated that the signer promised to attend our rally at Bible school on dedication day, having a blank space for name and address of signer. Three thousand of these were distributed, and over 1,200 were signed and brought in. We also had plenty of notices in the daily papers of the city inviting all interested to attend our rally, which was to begin at 8:45. In all of this advertising matter we announced we expected an attendance of over 1,000 and an offering over $200, and that each person present would receive a souvenir button, nearly two inches in diameter, on which was a picture of the church, date of dedication, etc.

April 15, attendance 564, we announced that on the following Sunday, our last in the old church, we would hold a farewell rally, and tickets would be given to every one present on that day to admit bearer to the new Sunday-school room on the afternoon of April 22, to assign classes to their permanent places in the new rooms. Our attendance in the old building the last day was 780, and the offering $90.66. There were over 750 present at the new church in the afternoon, and a short service was held. On dedication day we were all ready for the supreme effort. Our attendance was 1,682, offering $261.71. Our total offerings in April were $551.51.

For the last two months of the contest, our time was largely occupied in getting classes and work properly planned and arranged for the new building. We found the organized class to be an excellent plan to promote interest and attendance. We have 22 of such classes now, varying all from simply adopting a name and badge to the thoroughly organized class, with a full corps of officers and committees.

Our primary department, under Miss Hattie Hayden, superintendent, and 14 teachers, is being properly graded and organized with all the modern divisions. A home department has been organized with Guy B. Williamson as superintendent. New methods and ideas are watched and studied, and the ones that appear to be suited to our needs are tried. In this way we endeavor to keep up with the times and have something new to interest our scholars. Beginning July 1 we will use the star system to help a regular attendance.

As a result of the work being done by our teachers, many of our scholars have confessed Christ, and been received into the church; scarcely a Sunday passes without one or more going forward. On Easter Sunday 15 of them made the good confession, and on June 10 out of 31 received into the church on that day 27 were young people of our school.

From the Paris View Point.
Geo. W. Brown, Superintendent.

The Paris-Jacksonville contest was the result of the tact and foresight of our pastor, Brother Idleman. During the first part of December, 1905, the pastor and superintendent were discussing plans to bring a more complete attendance of the church membership into the Sunday-school. We determined to challenge that Christian Sunday-school of the state, which was nearest us in attendance and membership. We consulted Brother Marion Stevenson, who informed us that the church at Jacksonville was about "our size." We sent the Jacksonville school a formal friendly challenge to a contest as to attendance and offering, which was to continue to and close with the last Sunday in June, 1906. To stimulate our schools to more vigorous work, we agreed to exchange letters each week, stating the result of the contest for the previous Sunday. When interest was at fever heat we exchanged telegrams.

We organized our teachers with much care, and directed their persistent canvass for new scholars. The Pastor's Aid Society gave much valuable service. Each worker was strictly instructed to solicit no person who attended other schools. "Our own church membership into our own Sunday-school," was the watchword.

As the contest proceeded we could feel ourselves growing permanently stronger. New members were easier to secure. We have at this time almost succeeded in making it popular to attend Sunday-school. Our adult classes grew with unparalleled rapidity. We arranged a series of banners to recognize classes reaching certain goals. One banner was designated "Win One," which was given to the class showing the greatest number of new members enrolled. "Average givers" was awarded the class making the best average offering. We also had another banner, "Perfect Attendance." We soon found that we did not have enough "Perfect Attendance" banners. Six more banners marked "Perfect Attendance" were made. We have had several days when we did not have enough "Perfect Attendance" banners with this addition.

Our average attendance for last year was 302, with an enrollment of 595. For the first six months of this year our average attendance has been 606, with an enrollment of over 800. We have had only two "big days." Children's day our attendance reached 1,002, while on the closing day we had present in the classes at roll call 924. For the past six months our aggregate attendance has been 15,164 with offerings amounting to $943.57.

All the results of this contest can not be stated in this brief article. Some of them are:

1. We have succeeded in interesting our entire membership in the dynamic power of the Sunday-school.

2. We have become a Sunday-school with a greater missionary activity. Our school now supports by its own efforts a home missionary, amounting to $300 per year. Our Sunday-school gives annually $100 to Christian benevolences.

3. We have had pressed home to us the needs of the membership in our own congregation. We are not loudly proclaiming it, yet for more than a year our church has not permitted one of its members to be supported by the county, nor be buried at public expense.

4. Our teachers have been brought nearer to each other and to Him. Each teacher now more fully recognizes that upon her or him depends largely the salvation of each member of the class. Our teachers have become indeed pastoral helpers, and are welcomed into the sick room with almost as much appreication as a visit from our pastor.

5. The growth of our own school has stimulated every Sunday-school in the county to renewed efforts, especially those of our own brotherhood.

In conclusion, let us say if your school is waning in interest, you can give it the breath of eternal life in no more helpful way than to wage a friendly contest with a Sunday-school of our own brotherhood. A friendship has been developed between the contesting schools which has been beneficial in its influence. The superintendent of the Paris school visited the Jacksonville school on their dedication day, and was loyally received and entertained.

Central Bible School, Denver

By GEO. W. PERRIN,
Superintendent.

We have been asked what we consider the leading factors in our successful rally for missions at the Central Bible school, Denver.

We have but one grand rally for missions during each year. With this end in view we appoint a missionary committee a year ahead whose duty is to "boost" missions, carry on a definite education of the school, select a definite amount and make that the watchword for the year. Make an apportionment of the school by classes, taking due care to have the amounts low enough so they can go over or meet the amount. We have three very strong adult Bible classes with complete organization. They serve to promote Bible study, sociability, loyalty to class and school and actually apply the principles of Christianity to the every day walks of life as it should be, showing a Christlike spirit toward the stranger out of the kingdom, bringing them first into the class then to Christ as saved souls. We have had more confessions from the Sunday-school this year than during any previous year, showing that it is easy to get money for missions if the souls are first converted to Christ.

Some of the classes gave out little clay pigs months ahead of children's day for catching all stray dimes. A month before the eventful day they were weighed. Another class took pledges of varying amounts, another raised $1 per member and gave a social, each telling how they raised the money; another gave a good measure entertainment for a small silver offering each. The primary and intermediate classes were given the boxes three weeks ahead with the request that they bring $1 on children's day.

The superintendent hearing of the success some of the classes were having stimulated others not making good progress by offering them a small cash prize, to be added to the amounts of the three largest gifts in a certain department. There was a good natured rivalry which added to the interest and good results.

Take it all in all it was Bible school day and everybody felt the thrill of their enthusiasm and achievement. We are indebted to Bro. C. M. Morris for bringing into the school the idea of large gifts for missions. He taught his class and the whole school that it is as easy to think in dollars for missions as it is to think and give cents. His class with an attendance of seventy young ladies gave $210, the largest amount for any one class. The Dallas J. Osborne Bible class of about twenty-five young men gave $157, the largest amount per capita. Dr. C. C. Reid's young people's Bible class, with a regular attendance of more than 100, gave $140.58. The primary gave $24.92. All the others exceeded their apportionment with the total amount as given above. It must be said that it did not interfere with the weekly offering of the school, but increased them seventy chairs and other school equipment, such as blackboards, maps, music stands and music for the orchestra. Two hundred new song books and a large flag now grace the walls of our Sunday-school room and teaches a silent lesson of Christian patriotism.

The most delightful feature of the offering is the happy, loving spirit which has dominated from the beginning. It was an offering for the Lord's work, not any special mission, but for all, and to be apportioned as wisdom and love might dictate. Colorado, because the Central is a mother church, and because of its great need, will get more than half, but no selfish motive was used to inspire generosity in giving.

The Pastor and the Sunday School

By Cephas Shelburne

Every pastor ought to be vitally and enthusiastically connected with the Sunday-school of his church. Talking with a pastor, he said, "I believe the Sunday-school is an institution that is very much overrated." That pastor is simply ignorant of the history, achievements, place and possibilities of the Sunday-school. The pastor who is fearful that the great and splendid cause of the Sunday-school is losing ground should read the report of the Eleventh International Sunday-school convention held at Toronto last June. The report and addresses on the work and development of the Sunday-school make a book of 700 pages that will go down into history. There are fourteen hundred thousand officers and teachers, twelve millions of scholars, tens of thousands of libraries containing millions of books in the Sunday-schools of the United States. And the best is yet to be; for this young Atlanta among the religious forces in the church is just now beginning to realize its strength and possibilities. Isaac Errett said in 1884: "Here our money and toil will yield larger and more beneficial results than in any other field of benevolent activity." President Roosevelt in a late address on the Sunday-school said: "The modern Sunday-school, in my judgment, is the preparatory school for the church. It is the corner stone of the church of the future." The Sunday-school is a "world power" of great significance; an important factor in the extension of the Master's Kingdom. A really great church, great in numbers, in service, growth and possibilities, is impossible without a great Bible training school. The pastor must learn one thing, that as goes the Sunday-school, so goes the church; for here he is to get his converts and workers. This is the church's soul-winning equipment; and if not already such, it is destined to be the greatest evangelistic agency in the world. I believe the time will come when every congregation that builds a church, and every church that is working and every pastor that is preaching to save men will place the supreme emphasis on the Sunday-school. I believe the time will come when the superintendent will be considered holding as honorable place and will draw as large salary as the preacher; and when teachers will be specially trained for their work and will consider it an honor to volunteer their services in so noble a calling. The ultimate end of the Sunday-school is co-ordinate with that of the pastor, namely, to preach the Gospel and save men. Statistics tell us that nine-tenths of all those who come into the church of all denominations, do so before they are twenty-one years of age, and that fully 83 per cent of all who come into the churches come from the Sunday-school. Let the pastor remember that he is one preacher reaching a very few of the young, while he has as many sowers of the good seed, which is the word of God, into mellow, fruitful soil as he has faithful teachers in his Sunday-school. You are dealing with hard, unbending steel in your sad and hardened audiences; the children of the school are pliant clay in the hands of the potter.

But many of our preachers do not appreciate the Sunday-school. On every point in the Sunday-school the pastor ought to be master. As a piece of machinery he ought to know every wheel, pulley and band; as a business he ought to know its organization, methods and finances; as an institution he ought to know its history, work and equipment; as a school he ought to know its teaching force, wants and sources of supply.

We do not say that the pastor should be the superintendent. This responsibility should be assigned to other hands and talents. But every pastor should be the general overseer of his school. Every pastor should be a teacher, not necessarily in the school, but wherever practicable, a teacher of the teachers. He must be mighty in the Scripture, apt to teach. Here he should be authority, and reign without a rival. I do not say that the pastor must be, or at all times can be, in the school during every minute of its progress. But the pastor should be "on the inside," in the very heart of its activities. It is not too much to claim that a pastor's presence and prayer at the opening of the school, an occasional visit to the classes, and on the platform at its close, carries a meaning and benediction with it that he knows not how to estimate.

As God's word does not return unto him void, we are not surprised that the Sunday-school is an evangelistic power, accomplishing marvels; and, if not already such, it is destined to be the greatest evangelistic agency and soul-winning equipment in the world.

The Pastor's Relation to the Sunday School

By Josie Ballou Sherman

We have a profound respect for those of God's anointed who break to us the bread of life and while this subject was chosen for me, we do not presume, for one moment, to be able to instruct these in righteousness. What we may say is what we would like our pastor to be.

The primary work of the church is to make Jesus Christ known and obeyed and loved throughout the whole world.

The Sunday-school is the great feeder of the church. From it comes its educated, trained, spiritual workers. In these days of progress it would seem strange indeed if there had been no advance made in methods of work in the Sunday-school.

The secret of enabling any organized body to obtain an advantage is one of leadership. The people do not go beyond their leaders in knowledge and zeal, nor surpass them in consecration and sacrifice.

Therefore the pastor's relation to the Sunday-school is second to none. The Christian pastor holds the divinely appointed office for inspiring and guiding the thought and activities of the church. By virtue of his position he can be a mighty factor in the Sunday-school.

He is the general of the young army of boys and girls about to be Christian soldiers.

Wherever you find a pastor with overflowing earnestness, zeal and knowledge, you will find a church earnest and responsive. There is no way to get the ear of the whole church save through him. Any idea which he persistently preaches and prays for in the pulpit will be gradually accepted as a rule of conduct by the church. We want more preachers to work for the Sunday-school through the pulpit, so every father and mother, Christian and non-Christian, will feel the responsibility of being members of the Sunday-school along with the children.

To make this paper practical and fit the place for which the time is given it, we will look at the pastor.

First. As an educational factor in the Sunday-school.

We have already said the Sunday-school should be talked through the pulpit. It should be urged upon members of the church to attend. The preacher should then teach a class. His presence in the Sunday-school alone is an inspiration.

He should make a study of progressive methods and plans of teaching, and when he meets with his superintendent and teachers, propose and urge them.

He should visit the homes of the cradle roll members and should know the home department pupils.

In keeping the holidays of the Sunday-school the pastor's influence is unbounded. Often these programs for Easter, Christmas, Rally Day, etc., are placed in charge of young and inexperienced persons which is all right if they have the guiding hand of their director general. He should help choose the program. For instance, at Easter he should see to it that no child is asked to commit to memory one line or stanza or poem that is not worth a place in the memory. No song or recitation should be a part of the Easter program unless it interprets or emphasizes some part of the Easter message.

We have in mind a minister who requested a class of little children to sing the piece,

> "Mary to the Savior's tomb,
> Hastened at the early dawn,
> Spice she brought and sweet perfume,
> But the Lord she loved had gone," to the tune Martyn and it was indeed charming to listen how simply and sweetly a hymn could tell a chapter of the Easter story.

The same pastor asked his superintendent to admit no song or recitation unless it had some seed of Easter truth.

Tested by the same rule, every special program should be sifted by the pastor. Then the pupils gain that truth for which the service is held.

We have in mind another instance in a made up program for Christmas, where a young Miss recited a poem about "The death of a cow-boy on the western plains" and this was sandwiched between "The Shepherds abiding in the fields" and "The birth of the babe at Bethlehem," two beautiful sections of the Christmas story. Not very appropriate?

A pastor should use as many of the Sunday-school members as is possible, to assist him in his church work. There is a bond of union thus formed between pastor and pupil which will bring forth good.

Second. As a financial force, the pastor's influence is paramount.

Dr. Theodore T. Munger in the "Congregationalist" says, "There is no better test of a minister's character and ability to carry on and lead a parish than the way in which he manages its giving. A preacher should preach giving, should teach giving and should be persistent in it and persevering."

There is no better place for the education of systematic giving than in the Sunday-school. Let the pastor use his every power to instruct children along this line. It will then become a habit. Habit forms life.

Let pastors preach more and more on God's will concerning the acquiring, holding and using of money and sound out warnings about the sin of covetousness and the abuse of money.

A pastor should preach from the pulpit and teach in the Sunday-school and talk in the homes against the raising of money by side routes, fairs and festivals. We know this sounds a discordant note in the ears of some, but friends, all honest hearted Christians could be influenced to drop these methods entirely and give outright, because it is right. Then our children will learn to give outright, because it is right. Such things are all right from a social standpoint, but let the pastor preach that such doings to raise money belittle the dignity of the giving enterprises in the minds of Christians, provoke scorn among unbelievers, and dishonor Jesus Christ.

Every pastor should say with Dr. A. J. Gordon, whose church in Boston was such a missionary force, "I am tempted never to beg a cent for God again, but rather to spend my energy in getting Christians spiritualized, assured that they will then become liberalized." One day he came before his people and told them on a certain day a free will offering would be asked and he wished all members of the church, young people's societies, and the Sunday-school, would pray that the offering might be according to the will of God. When the day came around $10,000 was raised instead of $5,000 raised the year before.

Third. As a recruiting force. Bishop Taylor Smith says the needs of the church is to know, to grow, to glow, to go. When the church cannot send forth her members to propagate the gospel, she has reached a state in which she has nothing worth propagating. While it is impossible for a home pastor to be at the same time a foreign soldier in the army of the Lord, it is possible for him to be a recruiting officer for the war of world-wide conquest.

Why are English boys so eager to enter the army and navy? One very important reason is because Wellington and Nelson are held before them so much as heroes.

Then see what grand and noble sentiments might be instilled into the minds of Sunday-school students from babyhood; the sacrifice made that we might enjoy freedom from sin—the study of the lives of the heroes of the cross, the love of doing good for good's sake. The pastor should seek to create in the minds of the people a true conception of the nobility and exalted privilege of the missionary career.

Keep before them the thought that the greatest honor which can come to a Sunday-school is to have some of its members become missionaries. Hold up more frequently the missionary life as an ideal. Draw illustrations of heroism from the lives of missionaries.

Fourth. As a spiritual force.

The pastor, a praying man must make his church a praying church. Prayer and spirituality are as inseparable as faith and works. Jesus Christ by precept, by command and by example has shown with great clearness and force that he recognizes the greatest need of the Sunday-school and all other enterprises of the world-wide evangelization to be prayer. Are more Sunday-school workers needed? Preachers, pray for more workers from the pulpit. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth laborers. Is it money that we need? If so, in prayer lies the deepest secret. We have said and repeat—any idea which a pastor persistently preaches and prays for in the pulpit will be gradually accepted as a rule of conduct by the church. So pastors must pray for the Sunday-school and ask the parents to pray.

Pastors should see that the Sunday-school has more time given to prayer. We believe it to be the thing to teach children to pray to a Father in Heaven—a prayer of thankfulness for blessings given, for protection and care, even before they have arrived at the years of accountability. It is the pastor's work not only to urge the Sunday-school workers to prayer and convince them of its wonderful possibilities, but he must make them realize the urgent need for prayer. With all we have said carried out, the pastor as a spiritual force in the Sunday-school is pre-eminent. The spirituality of his church, the sacredness of the house of God, the salvation of the Sunday-school pupils hinges on the development of spirituality in the Sunday-school. That is the kindergarten of the church, the place for formation of habit, and the wise pastor will make the Sunday-school his constant care.

Our Budget

—Christianity is the only religion with temples for children.

—We cheerfully devote most of our space this week to Bible school interests.

—Preachers no longer loftily relegate such matters to women and children. What seed wheat is to harvests, Bible schools are to churches.

—It is but natural that our Bible schools should become of greater consequence when men like J. H. Hardin of Missouri, Marion Stevenson of Illinois, Howard Rash of Kansas, and J. H. Bryan of Iowa, devote their lives to increasing the efficiency of our schools and demonstrating their importance as factors in world redemption.

—J. Will Walters, Niantic, Ill., is planning for a great meeting in October. Church work there is progressing very favorably.

—I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, O., spent part of Monday at this office, en route to the Howard county (Mo.) annual Christian church rally.

—T. M. Myers is in a meeting at Fordyce, Ark. There have been fourteen added to the church thus far, all of whom are among the best citizens of the town.

—O. M. Thomason has met with great success during his Washington ministry, but desires to resume evangelistic work farther east. At present he may be addressed at Davenport, Washington.

—D. F. Sellard's congregation at Leon, Iowa, recently gave him a surprise party—the entire resident membership went to prayer meeting. Naturally he would like to be so surprised every Wednesday evening.

—F. E. Truckles, principal of the West Lafayette (Ind.) high school, has determined to offer his services to the churches as a singing evangelist. E. B. Scofield, of Indianapolis, very highly recommends him.

—The Boone county (Mo.) Christian churches, 16 in number, will hold their annual rally and convention at the Red Top Church, from July 30 to Aug. 1. The names of very able men and women grace the program.

—W. A. Parker, minister at Emporia, Kan., writes that his church will sell its old pews at half first cost. They are ash, trimmed in walnut, gothic end blocks. It is hoped this offer will prove helpful to some other congregation.

—John Logan, 733 Ferry St., Eugene, Ore., knows of a middle-aged minister, scholarly, eloquent, and successful who wishes to locate where there is a prospect of building up a strong church and continuing for a number of years.

—W. T. Clarkson, of Lawrence, Kan., is spending his vacation in Birmingham and other points in Alabama. He occupied the pulpit of the First Church at Birmingham July 18, in the absence of A. R. Moore, the regular pastor.

—Albert Shaw has proven so helpful as minister to the church at Fairfield, Ill., that at the last meeting of the official board, he was called to that pastorate so long as the church and pastor are satisfied with present arrangements.

—L. M. D. Wells, formerly of Wilkinsburg, and under whose ministrations that church has become one of the strongest in western Pennsylvania, has accepted a call to East Orange, N. J. He will do graduate work in Columbia University in conjunction with his church duties.

—The Newton county (Mo.) Chautauqua has recently concluded a twelve-day session at Neosho. It is said to have been the most successful yet held in the county. For this much credit is due F. F. Walters, our resident minister.

—N. B. McGhee of the Gage (Okla.) church is in great demand for popular addresses and so fulfills his engagements as to give great delight to his hearers and increase the prestige and helpfulness of the church for which he ministers.

—George W. Kneffer, of Somerset, Pa., has accepted a unanimous call to the Wilkinsburg, Pa., church. He will prove a worthy successor to L. M. D. Wells and contribute a hero's part to the upbuilding of that promising church.

—Evangelist Clara H. Haselrigg recently concluded a meeting at Atwood, Kan., with more than sixty received into the church by confession and baptism, and is now in a meeting at St. Francis with flattering prospects of success.

—The Ralls county (Mo.) convention will meet this year at Prairie View, August 27-29. H. F. Davis, of the Christian Publishing Company, formerly state Bible school superintendent, will make the principal address of the Bible school session.

—Mrs. W. F. Phelps, of Bland, Mo., writes that R. B. Havener has just completed a brief meeting there with six additions to the church—five by confession and baptism. During the meeting the indebtedness of the church was entirely liquidated.

—C. A. Ashton's ministry at St. Francis and Atwood, Kan., is very highly commended. Other preachers are greatly needed in northwestern Kansas. Doubtless Brother Ashton will gladly place those who would go in correspondence with the churches.

—J. D. Lawrence, Christian evangelist supported chiefly by this company, is engaged in a meeting at Rayerton, Ind. Weak churches he can probably aid up to the point of having regular preaching services receive his attention first. Address him at Muncie, Ind.

—Our profoundest sympathy goes to the bereft N. J. Aylsworth in this hour of his great affliction. Be brave as always, dear brother, it will not be long at the longest, till with all the loved and lost awhile you will be rejoicing in those spiritual realms of which you have written so helpfully.

—C. S. Osterhus, whose splendid article on our Scandinavian brotherhood was one of the chief features of last week's Christian-Evangelist, resides at Ossian, Ia. He will highly appreciate letters of inquiry concerning his mission and of fraternal greeting and fellowship.

—H. G. Hill will speak at the Rockford, Ill., Chautauqua, August 31. After three weeks' vacation he begins a six months' lecture tour under the management of the Redpath bureau. We are pleased to note Brother Hill's enlarging sphere of usefulness in this new ministry.

—Guy L. Zerby reports a most excellent meeting held at Alexis, Ill., by evangelists Buchanan and Gardner, during which time 42 were added to the church. Brother Zerby soon relinquishes the work there. The church will need a creditable successor. May he soon be found.

—We are in receipt of note that Marion Hunter Garrard, pastor of the Second Christian Church, Syracuse, N. Y., and Miss Marie Antoinette Ziechmann, Cleveland, were recently married by R. Moffett. We wish this young couple lives of ever-increasing usefulness and consequent growing happiness as the years go on.

"Help us to get into our own church home."

ARE YOU READY

to enlist your congregation for Church Extension in SEPTEMBER?

The Board at Kansas City ceased promising loans in March and have asked for aid in building since then, and $125,000 is needed for these appeals. Inspiration enough, you say, to enlist any Church of Christ in the Annual Offering.

WRITE AT ONCE,

ordering literature and collection envelopes, and tell the Board you will take the offering.

The Annuity feature of Church Extension is profitable to you and the Board. You receive 6 per cent and the Board builds churches with your money. Write for information to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo.

—By reason of newspaper reports many have received the impression that Bro. W. D. McCulley was called to the pastorate of Cameron (Mo.) church. Brother McCulley will make his home in Cameron, but L. O. Bricker continues as efficient and beloved pastor of the church in Cameron.

—One of the saddest of editorial tasks is to reduce such a splendid piece of writing as George Combs read before the Missouri State Sunday-school convention to the limitations of our space. Every word taken away was a gem, every sentence a sunburst. Read it, for even its outline is beauty.

—The Lincoln county (Mo.) convention will be held in the New Galileo church beginning the evening of August 13, and holding over August 15. Those going to the convention via Winfield will notify Olin J. Gary, of Moscow Mills, who will have conveyances ready to take them to the assembly.

—Bro. Richard Bagby, of Scranton, Pa., writes that the Dunsmore church is greatly rejoicing over the last payment having been made on its old indebtedness. The Bible school having outgrown its present quarters, the church has contracted for additional rooms to be added to the church at a cost of $3,000.

—E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., has just sent us from his summer vacation grounds in the Old Dominion State an inspiring article that will soon appear in the Centennial department of this paper. All wish this genial pastor and brilliant pulpiteer a restful summer and renewed strength for the great demands the future will make upon him.

—M. W. Harkins, of Union City, Ind., will spend his August vacation on the Pacific coast supplying J. V. Coombs' pulpit at San Jose, Cal., while the latter is in the east seeking help for the California churches suffering loss by the recent earthquake disaster. Brother Harkins will gladly answer inquiries concerning our cause on the "Golden Slopes."

—J. T. Webb, of the Kearney (Neb.) church, announces that the Clay county convention will meet with the Kearney church July 28 and 29. An excellent program has been arranged and sessions of deep spiritual interest and instruction are expected. His generous, hospitable people extend a cordial invitation to all who possibly can to attend the convention.

—During H. E. Wilhite's two years' pastorate at San Bernardino, Cal., there were 300 additions at regular services. During that time also he organized the churches at Colton and Rialto. Brother Wilhite is now visiting relatives in Kansas and Missouri. He will enter the general evangelistic field in August. He may be addressed at Stafford, Kan.

—After all that is said about "the new evangelism," "the new thought," and "wider views of God's mercy," the Bible still teaches that if a man would be saved he must exercise faith in Jesus as the Son of God, repent of his sins, confess Christ before men, and be baptized into the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

—It also teaches that if one would keep saved, he must to his faith add virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, love of the brethren and love for all; that he must grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, forgetting the things which are behind, stretching forward to the things which are before.

—J. A. Cunningham, the "preacher drummer," of Tupelo, Miss., preached a two hours' sermon before the Baptist congregation at Emma, Miss., on the subject of "The Three Dispensations of the One Plan of Salvation." He tried to impress upon the brethren the necessity of abandoning their teaching that regeneration is complete before baptism.

—After a pastorate of nearly four years at Virginia, Ill., J. W. Carpenter has resigned and accepted the work at Neodesha, Kan. Brother Carpenter and the writer were baptized together in Cuba, Ill., and were room-mates at Eureka and Lexington Bible colleges. We wish for him all the success in his new pastorate that his splendid abilities promise.

—Secretaries Wright and Ranshaw request every preacher to send his name and correct address, together with the name and location of the church to which he ministers to his state corresponding secretary, and not to the Cincinnati office, except where there is no state corresponding secretary. Preachers are requested to give immediate attention to this as the 1907 year book is now in course of preparation.

—The Dexter (Mo.) Chautauqua, under the mangament of Chas. E. Stokes, will be held the first and second week of August. Several men and women of national reputation will address the week day and evening audiences. Geo. L. Snively, of The Christian-Evangelist, will be the preacher for Lord's day, August 5. He is eagerly anticipating meeting many Disciples from southeast Missouri.

—"There are only about 300 hymns in the English language that deserve a place in a Christian church hymnal. I think that nearly all these hymns are in Gloria in Excelsis." J. W. McGarvey (president Bible College), Lexington, Ky. There are really more than 300 hymns in the English language that ought to live and all are found in this book that this company will distribute wherever wanted at lowest possible cost.

—S. E. Thompson, of Hillsburg, Ont., sends an interesting account of the tenth annual convention of the Churches of Christ of the Wellington district, held in Grand Valley, Ont., the 5th and 6th inst. Besides the actual attendance by those living in the district, R. W. Stevenson, "provincial evangelist" for Ontario, and J. Trickey, of the Orangeville Baptist Church, greatly helped make the convention interesting and inspiring.

—We greatly deplore the seemingly untimely decease of Bro. J. G. Creason, pastor of the Lathrop, Mo., church. W. F. Richardson conducted his funeral July 18. Brother Creason was one of our ablest, most devout and successful preachers. We trust the sympathy of a brotherhood her husband so faithfully served and the comfort of the Holy Spirit may sweetly and fully sustain Sister Creason through these sad hours.

—Hiram College has just conferred the degree of Master of Arts on Sherman B. Moore, of Oklahoma City. Accompanying the diploma was the following message from the secretary, "You may regard this action as a personal compliment of a high order but one that all felt was fully deserved in your case in view of your attainments." We can testify from personal observation that Brother Moore is doing the work of an evangelist in a "masterly" way in Oklahoma City.

—J. C. Blanchard, of Smith Centre, dedicated a new union church near Portis, Kan., July 8. The building was erected by citizens of the community as a house of worship and is to be controlled by a board of trustees, no two of whom are allowed to be members of the same religious organization. This is Brother Blanchard's first dedicatory service, but his success was such as to lead his friends to believe he can be helpful to other congregations at dedication time.

—J. T. Ferguson and wife have resigned their pastorate with the East Side church, Moberly, Mo., to re-enter the State University and Bible college at Columbia, Mo. During their eighteen months' stay in Moberly a new church board, an auxiliary to the C. W. B. M., Young Ladies' Circle, Junior Endeavor Society and the prayer meeting were organized, the membership increased more than one-fourth, and a new spirit of union and good will between the two Christian churches in the city created.

—F. D. Power sweetly plaints that the vitals were blue-penciled ont of his recent Bethany College article. The piece was universally regarded as interesting and helpful, even if it did fail to state there are now $100,000 in Bethany's Permanent Endowment Fund; that a new library is being built at a cost of $20,000, and a new gymnasium erected and a large dormitory for boys opened. We rejoice in the new era of usefulness dawning upon dear Bethany—the mother of them all.

—Through Wm. L. Hipsley, Table Grove, Ill., we learn the church there recently celebrated its fortieth anniversary by remodeling and rebuilding its house of worship. Appropriate services were conducted by the pastor, E. J. Stanley, assisted by J. E. Parker, of Galesburg, Ill. Thirty have been added to the church during the past year, eighteen by confession and baptism. The church now has preaching full time and begins evangelistic meetings November 1.

—L. G. Batman, of the First Church, Philadelphia, sends us copy of the interesting programme of the seventy-third annual convention of the Christian Missionary Society of eastern Pennsylvania, to be held at Wilkes-Barre in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium, July 31 to August 2. The program is too long for publication but contains some exceedingly interesting themes to be discussed by some of the ablest men and women of our brotherhood. We trust there will be a large attendance. It startles us just a little to note this is the seventy-third annual convention of our Pennsylvania brethren.

—Edgar D. Jones, who soon succeeds Ross Lloyd at the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., writes that it was with travail of heart himself and family relinquished the Franklin Circle Church of Cleveland, but felt compelled to leave the lake front in order to prolong his usefulness among the churches. At a farewell reception accorded them by Franklin Circle, Sister Jones and himself were presented with a morocco volume containing autographs of the entire membership. The historic Franklin Circle has never been a stronger fortress of righteousness than now, and prospects for greatly increased usefulness are bright.

—Senator L. L. Taylor, of Centerville, Ia., sends newspaper clippings referring to the resignation of F. L. Moffett as pastor of the Christian church of that city, voicing the universal regret at his departure, combined with splendid testimonials of his efficiency. The chief reason ascribed for his going to Springfield, Mo., is the better educational advantages possible there for his two sons who will soon begin their college careers. The church has been greatly strengthened during his ten years' pastorate and the cause of religion mightily advanced. The Centerville church hopes to have a man begin October 1, immediately after Brother Moffett's removal to Springfield.

—Editor J. H. Garrison, commenting upon chairman S. M. Cooper's formal announcement to the churches of W. J. Wright's finally accepting his third call to become Corresponding Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, and Brother Cooper's congratulations to the brotherhood over securing such a leader, writes: "THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST also congratulates the brotherhood on brother Wright's acceptance of this most responsible position, and it congratulates Brother Wright also on his manifestation of the qualities which have caused his brethren to call him to this important post. Let him now lead on to greater things, and the rest of us will hold up his hands."

—The congregation at Lebanon, Mo., Harold Bell Wright, minister, has placed THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in the home of every member of the church. No other expression of fraternity could be so helpful to the membership. There should be a Christian paper in every Christian home everywhere. Every interest of the church, the church itself, and all the ideals of primitive Christianity would be quickly and tremendously advanced if all our congregations would follow the example set by Lebanon. We suggest to all our evangelists the advisability of distributing 300, 500 or 1,000 CHRISTIAN-EVANGELISTS per week in the communities where they are holding meetings. This will not only fill the churches with hearers, but with prepared listeners. It has been proven an exceedingly helpful factor in meetings wherever tried.

—Our general superintendent was born and schooled in Illinois, and has missed preaching in that state comparatively few Lord's days in twenty years, and is to-day ministering to two of her congregations. While Secretary of our Benevolences he saw that state become the largest contributor to that ministry—membership considered. It was his pleasure to receive his first $1,000, $2,500 and $10,000 gifts to the Association from his native state. In his present position he has seen THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST welcomed into more than one thousand new homes and its circulation increasing in that state more rapidly than ever before. Naturally he feels under profound obligations to Illinois Disciples for this continued fellowship and helpful co-operation in the great ministries of the church. Any service he can render the preachers and others of the brotherhood in that grand commonwealth will be most cheerfully performed.

—The book on "The Holy Spirit," by the Editor of this paper, has received many remarkable commendations, but none, we think, more remarkable than the following: "I have lately been reading with intense pleasure your remarkable book, "The Holy Spirit." I have never viewed Christianity in the broadly transfigured light you have thrown upon it. I have been studying carefully the four Gospels and comparing them with the theories in your book. The result has been a complete and happy change in my idea of religion, and I feel now as if I had, like a leper of old, touched the robe of Christ and been healed of a long standing infirmity. I thought the New Testament was old and familiar to me; but you have made it a new and marvelous book, full of most precious meaning, and I hope I may be able to impart to those whom it is my duty to instruct, something of the great consolation and hope with which your writing has filled me." What compensation can come to an author of a book comparable to a testimony like that, and it is only one of hundreds which the author has received orally and by letter.

California State Meeting.

California extends a cordial invitation to the great brotherhood of Disciples to attend the stae meeting at Santa Cruz, July 24 to August 5, inclusive. The earthquake shook us up pretty badly, but California to-day, with its mountains and valleys, rivers, lakes and sea, is as beautiful and serene as ever. In addition to scenery we now have ruins that rival those of the coliseum and Karnak. But greater than scenery or ruins is the stalwart faith of our people. Come and be with us.

We have no church in the state. "Our plea" was never before preached in Manchester. Brother Yeuell preached to more than 700 last Lord's day and received 7 confessions. If he can be kept there three months, a New Testament church will be established in that important city. Help is needed right now. Contributions from $1.00 up will be acknowledged here. Another Five Thousand Dollar Fund for Church Extension.

Fred Doeller and family of Columbus, Ind., have agreed to establish a named fund of $5,000 in our church extension work, to be known as "The Ruth M. Doeller Memorial Fund," in memory of their daughter and sister, Ruth M. Doeller. This is the 16th named fund established in our church extension work.

The $5,000 is to be paid into the fund at the rate of $500 or more annually and this named fund is to be loaned in such state or states where Brother Doeller and family maintain an evangelist.

The first grant from this fund will go to help erect the new building at Ruston, Louisiana, where the first church has been organized by John A. Stevens, state evangelist, who is supported by Brother Doeller and family. One year ago the Louisiana State Convention was appointed to meet in June, 1906, in Ruston before our brethren in Louisiana knew a church would be organized there. The success of the Louisiana work is more than pleasing—it is an inspiration. It is little wonder that a practical business man and manufacturer like Mr. Doeller should choose a field like this for his named fund to work in.

Of Ruston Brother Stevens writes:

"Well, we are proceeding on the old plan here at Ruston; that is to buy our own lot and pay for it, get a good title, raise all we are able to on a subscription and then ask the church extension board to loan us $1,000. We have the best church lot in town, just 300 feet from the center of the city. There is but one church on the south side of the railroad and it a small "holiness" church. There are 3,500 people on the south side. On the north side of the railroad there are but 2,000 people and three of the large churches on that side. So you see we pre-empted the larger part of the town. It seems that nothing can keep us from having an audience. There is just one bridge that spans all the railroad tracks in the business part of the town and our church will stand at the south abutment of that bridge and will be an everlasting advertisement of itself, as it is the only church in the city in full view of the stores and hotels and the entire business part of the town. The lot is worth $1,000, but the man who owned it either thought at the time that it would be an easy way to pick up $50 forfeit money, or else he wanted a church on that side to enhance the value of other property he owns there. So he let me have it for $700. He told me when I bought the option in these words, "I want you to understand that I know that it is worth $1,000 of any man's money, but I said in order to get a church over there you could have it for $700." We will pay every dollar of this money day after to-morrow, for we have it all on hand. Now we hope to be able to have $1,700 worth of property to mortgage to the church extension board, and we want but $1,000.

THE STELTON
OCEAN GROVE, N. J.
Large rooms, artesian water, two blocks from ocean, spacious verandas, home cooking, half block from lawn tennis and croquet grounds, and lake for rowing, Terms $6 to $12 per week. H. W. STELLE, Proprietor.

What a satisfaction Bro. Doeller and family will have in watching their memorial fund work in this productive field of Louisiana! New prosperous towns are springing up in this state as they are in our western states and the soil is virgin for our plea. Bro. Doeller's money makes it possible to go into these towns early and shape the religious thought of these new communities with the truth that makes us free in Christ Jesus.

The F. M. Drake fund, started Feb. 1st, 1889, has built 58 churches and has done the work of $22,191 and his fund has been increased by $3,070 of interest at four per cent. There is every inducement to persuade men and women to create named funds in our church extension work.—G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec.

The Newest Evangelism.

original importance and effectiveness. All are priests, all are preachers. In the old way the evangelist battles with his own strength, in the newest way, he has become a multitude. Under the old procedure the success or failure of a meeting hinged almost solely on the evangelist—if he were strong and earnest and eloquent, well; if he were weak and halting in speech then ill. In this newest way it is not so. Any stick of a preacher will do if the school is on fire with evangelistic zeal.

2. It commends itself to us in that it makes possible a perennial revival. This I take it is a great desideratum. When a boy in the country I used to hear in the conventions of Sunday-school workers the discussion of this topic: "How to Have an Evergreen Sunday-school." It is a worthy aim—a school that runs through the winter as through the summer months—an evergreen school. Now we also want and need an evergreen revival—not a revival of start and spasm but of stand and stay. The church passes through all temperatures and the facility of the upward climb of the mercury is equalled only by the velocity of the downward slide. Now it is a furnace, now an ice house. The new-born soul is cradled in flowers then flung into a snow drift. All this is against reason and against religion. How have a revival that shall be evergreen? By the way of the newest evangelism. Instead of the hiss and crackle of flame followed by a heap of lifeless ashes you may have an equable heat. The way of the newest evangelism is the way into the land of perpetual summer. It is the Florida of the church of God.

3. The newest evangelism commends itself in that it is both scientific and scriptural. Solomon's injunction to begin life culture with the child finds a hearty amen in Starbuck, in James, in King, in Hall—in all the voices of the new psychology. Common sense has not failed to see that the chosen time to combat disease is in its inception, the new physiology and the new psychology bring largeness of confirmatory data. The moist and fertile soil beneath the quickening rays of the spring sun no more strongly invites the sowing of seed than the open heart of childhood the gospel of Jesus Christ. And this child before whom science bows in wonder is the child whom Jesus held in his arms.

4. This newest evangelism is all permeating and all inclusive. Unify your Bible school and you unify the church as a whole. Spiritualize your Bible school and you have spiritualized every department of Christian activity. It is the only way. Heat ascends, not descends. If you would warm your house you do not build a fire in the attic, but in the basement. Nor should the divine fires be kindled in the attic chambers of age, but in the basement chambers of youth. Age is isolation, youth is communication. By so much as the sun is a better evangelist than the snow mountain is the conversion of children better than the conversion of the aged. Get the man or the woman and you have gotten one; get the child and you have gotten both man and woman.

5. It commends itself by its marvellous results. It is an evangelism that evangelizes. It is no theory but an actuality. It works. It secures largest yields. In no other way will a like expenditure of time and effort count for so much. It invites us by the breadth of its accomplishments. May I be pardoned for a personal word? I speak of what I know. For more than a year the church I have the honor to serve has laid special stress upon this evangelism. Our decision days are the notable days in the calendar and on these days I have been made glad by such triumphs of the gospel of grace as I had not even dared to dream of. On one of these decision days in response to the invitation twelve came forward—upon another twenty-one—upon another, thirty-two—upon another, forty-eight.

We are approaching our centennial. We would double our membership to two and a half million members by 1909. Along the present lines of effort we shall not even come within sight of such accomplishments. We are but trying with a battle cry. We have no confidence in our undertaking. And yet it is practicable. We can if we will double our membership by that centennial hour. If every church in our great brotherhood shall concentrate its efforts on our Bible schools, putting time into them, putting work into them, putting money into them, striving earnestly and heroically to double their membership and convert them into fire-hot evangelistic forces and agencies—if every church would but do this there would arise to us such Pentecostal awakenings as this old world has never seen before and when that memorable year should have rolled around, we should turn a mighty host two and a half million strong toward the gates of Pittsburg and with jubilation and with song praising God for his wonderful works among the children of men.

I have failed, I know, in giving any adequate expression to the importance and to the promise of this—God's evangelism. May our brotherhood be aroused to this great opportunity. Surely, surely, we cannot fail to read and heed this heaven-sent message. May flaming heralds go up and down among us crying, "Make way, make way for the Bible schools and the evangelism that is in wisdom and in love.

God's blessings upon this mighty host, and may he bring them all at last to reign with him in glory forever and forever.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Illinois Notes.

The churches at Emden and Bethel have just joined in support of Bro. C. A. Sittser, who recently came to Eureka College from Wisconsin. He will continue his work in college and serve the two churches. Such a combination would save many weak churches. The churches at Delevan and the Malone church ought to combine. They might include another small church in this circle. There are many such unions or "federations" that would be unquestionable, for good. Try it. At Bethel, our efficient evangelist, W. H. Kindred, grew to manhood, and here our own beloved president, R. E. Hieronymus, obeyed the Gospel of Christ.——At Lincoln, W. H. Cannon and his splendid congregation are doing fine business in their beautiful new house. The membership has about doubled in the last two years and the greater enterprises of the church will feel its warm impulses more in the future than in the past. Education Day was prominent in the church's calendar last year and will doubless ever be in the future.—D. A. Lindsey and the church at Mt. Pulaski have the plans for a new church and are securing subscriptions. They expect it to cost $8,000. The present pastorate has lasted nearly three years and few places in the state have shown more marked improvement. The church numbers 300, with a Sunday-school of 125 and Christian Endeavor of 30. The building spirit is all over the state and at no time in our history have the brethren responded more liberally to this enterprise. It is a very rare instance for a church to be dedicated without all indebtedness being provided for. A number of additions have been received recently by the Cornland church where John Lemmon, one of our valued trustees of Eureka college, preaches half time.

The Texas church, near Clinton, is taking on new life under the ministry of L. P. Fisher, who visits them half time while attending Eureka college. It is a country church with a splendid field and is practically responsible for the spiritual teaching and life of a large territory.

At Moroa W. H. Applegate is just getting settled in his new pastorate. The church feels greatly encouraged to get a minister after waiting so long. The Sunday-school is already greatly increased. From the splendid class of young people there, Eureka college ought to be training some of them for the churches' larger life.

J. F. Smith has recently taken up the work at Waynesville with prospects of large usefulness, with a willing and industrious people. One of its best young men in attending Eureka College. The family consists of mother and son, so mother came also so they could be together. This is a good plan. If others would like to try it we will tell you about property here if you will ask us.

At Clinton, E. A. Gilliland is finishing nine years of a pastorate; how much is to follow is not yet written. Long pastorates make strong churches and strong preachers if both do their best. The Clinton church has a large membership with all activities hard at work.

At Hallsville, where our ever beloved T. T. Holton ministers to the people, we found things in good order. It is really a country church. Here Harry M. Barnett, one of our strong ministers of Kansas City, Mo., and his cousin, J. A. Barnett, our valuable preacher at Pekin, grew to manhood, graduated at Eureka college, and are great servants of the churches. If more churches would look after the boys, more would enter the ministry.

The strong church at Atlanta, where I. W. Agee, ministers, is doing good work, as it always does. It has had some of our best preachers, among whom are R. F. Thrapp and S. S. Lappin. It is no easy task to follow such men, but we hope that the ministry just begun by Brother Agee will exceed them all. The church numbers 250, with a Sunday-school of 175, for which Sister Tuttle has furnished a splendid library. The auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. numbers 25.

The Pekin church perhaps takes the largest number of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELISTS of any church in the state, the number is 87; if others can beat it let them speak out. The offerings during the last half year for missions and other outside work amounts to $190. This for a young church of 300 members, most of them young, is a fine record for the young pastor, J. A. Barnett to make. Membership, offerings and size of various departments have about doubled during his two and a half years of ministry.

Bro. D. W. Conner is getting the work in fine condition, and is much loved at Edinburg. The church is strong, active, united and in a good house. They recently royally entertained the convention of the fifth district.

Bro. Moses Hughes is preaching half time at Rochester. This is a fine field, with an excellent preacher and good people. We ought to grow under such conditions.

The good old church at Taylorville is moving forward under the able and delightful ministry of Bro. Z. Moore. This church is able for great things, and is beginning to do them. When it knows its power it will be felt more in all our great enterprises.

At Blue Mound, Bro. W. H. Harding is leading the church in building a new $12,000 house. It is a beauty as well as one of the most substantial buildings we have. We will expect great things from this strong church when it gets into its splendid home.

Bro. J. M. Morgan has just moved to Raymond to serve the church and also to give part time to Harvel. This is a fine combination and both fields, weak in the past, will doubtless grow under the guidance of such a minister.

Litchfield has begun a $5,000 addition to their comparatively new house which proved inadequate to the growing conditions and large audiences that gather under the able preaching of M. S. Johnson. We like to see the walls bursting out to give room for the people to come and worship and hear the gospel. May the houses rapidly become too small. Brethren, fads and sensations have their day, but if you want the churches full of people preach the gospel.

Cause of Sick Headache.

Severe attacks of Sick Headache are due to a Torpid, Congested Liver and a Disordered Stomach. No one can enjoy good health when the stomach refuses to do its necessary work. One bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine, a purely vegetable compound, has often brought complete health to persons suffering with the above named symptoms, and in many cases pronounced incurable by some of the best physicians in the country.

A large bottle, usual dollar size, can be obtained at drug stores for 75 cents, but a trial bottle with full instructions will be sent free to every reader of this paper who needs it.

Iowa Notes.

First: Our state convention. The year 1905-6, was the greatest missionary year in our history. Eighteen churches were assisted in supporting preaching by the I. C. C. paying from $50.00 to $300.00 on the pastor's salary. These missionary pastors added to the churches 284 by confession and baptism and 261 from other sources. The I. C. C. employed ten evangelists for all or part of the year. These ten men held forty-eight meetings, baptized 831 and received 470 from other sources. Besides the above, 26 volunteer missionary meetings were held without expense to the missionary society, in which 322 were baptized and 129 were added from other sources. Twenty-two men were engaged in this work. Here is a summary of the missionary work of the year: I. C. C. evangelists and pastors, 24; pastors holding volunteer meetings, 22; total number of men, 46; number of churches assisted, 90; number of days of labor, 6,494; number of sermons, 3,474; number of baptisms, 1,447; number added from other sources, 860; total number of additions, 2,307; money raised for state missions, $9,405.18.

In addition to the above Secretary Denny raised $13,384.87, that is not included in the above.

Ninety-one per cent of the churches that have sent in their statistics report gains. The average gain to the church is 23 members for each congregation, 14 by confession and baptism, 3 from the denominations and 6 from other sources. If this average holds good throughout the state there were 10,000 disciples added to the churches last year in Iowa.

The convention was royally entertained by Percy Leach and his church at Iowa City, but the poor railroad facilities and the location of Iowa City at one side of the state made the attendance below our standard. Two hundred sixty-two out-of-town delegates registered. Every session was brim full of interest and the convention was counted one of the best.

We are losing two of our good preachers from Iowa. T. J. Dow who for five years has served the East Des Moines church so well, goes to Minnesota. F. L. Moffett, for ten years pastor of the church at Centerville goes to Springfield, Mo. For two years brother Moffett has been vice-president of our state board and was one of the best of men in counsel. We regret to see these good men go from us but we are sure that they will give a good account of themselves wherever they are.

We are to have a state wide simultaneous evangelistic campaign in Iowa beginning the second Sunday in January, 1907, and continuing until April first. Keep Iowa in mind, there will be something doing here this year.

The executive committee to have the campaign in charge consists of G. B. Van Arsdall for Northwest Iowa, Loren Howe for the northwest, S. H. Zendt for the southeast, W. T. Fisher, southwest, C. S. Medbury, central district, B. S. Denny, general superintendent and H. O. Breeden, chairman. A subcommittee will be appointed for each district with the ones named as chairmen.

F. L. Moffett resigned as vice-president on account of his going out of the state and S. H. Zendt was appointed in his stead.

Our series of district conventions begin August 21.—B. S. Denny, Cor. Sec., Des Moines, Iowa.

Kentucky Notes.

On July 9 there was organized in the First Christian Church, The Louisville Christian Bible School Association. It is composed of representatives of the various Christian churches in and about the city, and its object is to establish new schools in such places as the executive committee may determine. The following officers were elected T. S. Tinsley, president; E. L. Williams, vice-president; G. E. Fisher, secretary, and T. E. Basham, treasurer.——A conference for the Bible school workers of South Kentucky will be held at Mayfield, August 1, 2 and 3. The faculty is composed of R. M. Hopkins, E. A. Fox, R. H. Crossfield, H. D. Smith, G. H. C. Stoney, S. F. Fowler and other prominent Bible school workers. There will be five hours every day devoted to the discussion of Bible Study, Child Study, Methods of Teaching, Methods of Management and the Work of the Pastor. The conference promises to be one of unusual interest to Bible school workers. Cheap railroad rates have been secured and the Mayfield church extends hospitality to all who attend. The names are requsted to be sent at once to R. L. Clark, Mayfield, Ky.——The state convention for all departments of church work will be held at the First Christian Church, September 24-27. A most interesting program is announced and a large attendance is expected. All delegates will be provided with lodging and breakfast by the churches of the city. Let us plan now to make this state convention the greatest in the history of state work.—R. M. Hopkins, Louisville, Ky.

Virginia Items.

Norfolk is enjoying the greatest boom in her existence; I am not saying whether this is enviable or not. All that I can say is, that the majority are making the most out of it possible. The Jamestown Exposition, known as the Tricentennial anniversary of the first white settlement in Virginia, and the first English settlement in America, will open its doors to the world, on April 26, '07. Among those who come—and many will come from every quarter of the globe—we expect to see numbers of our own brethren, and to you we desire to say, bring your religion with you and use it to good purpose, whether you are a visitor on pleasure bent, or seeking an investment and home with us. You can do much to increase the usefulness of the church, and to enlighten those who are in ignorance of us as a people, as to numbers and what we are doing in helping to evangelize the world, but also in bringing God's people into the union for which Jesus prayed. In this section, Norfolk and Portsmouth and adjacent towns, there is a population of considerably more than one hundred thousand souls. We have three churches of not over four hundred members. One, Portsmouth, an infant, not yet a year old, keeping house in a rented hall; another, the Second Park Place, Norfolk, just about two years old, keeping house in a rented hall. You see we need you; come, prepared to work with a people little known, and weak in finance, and you will be rewarded here as well as hereafter. On May 18th we closed an eleven-days' meeting at the Second church, held by R. E. Elmore of Portsmouth, Va.; while there was only one addition, and he reclaimed, the result visible would have justified the outlay and effort. Still we know the invisible results are far-reaching and will not be measured here, when I say the preaching was good, old Jerusalem doctrine, I put it mildly, I join with the good people with whom he has been laboring in regretting the necessity for his leaving here. The little band of the Second church, is composed of noble men and women, who know what it means to labor for the Lord, and to sacrifice too; I have never met nobler people anywhere. Sunday was children's day, and at night the children rendered the program splendidly. It speaks well for the three ladies who had it in charge. Results of birthday box and offering, $14.58, which may seem small to many of you, kind readers, but if you knew them and what else they are doing, you would say, "splendid."—W. C. Wade, Norfolk, Va.

People's Forum

To the Editor of The Christian-Evangelist:

Which shall it be—the editors or the secretaries? A little while since a certain editor advised the secretaries that if they—the secretaries—endorsed certain men and certain views—said editor would withdraw support from them and their societies. Under such pressure one secretary was constrained to make a declaration of the principles and policies of his society; but even this did not save him.

The tables are now turned and one secretary proclaims in a "fearful parable" that the thief is robbing the society, said thief being the editors who dare to discuss certain questions in which the whole protestant church is interested. Shall the churches be governed by the editors or secretaries? Will the churches speak out.—H.

[We permit the foregoing to go in without note or comment at present, further than to say that "H." is one of our veteran preachers who wears a historic name in the annals of our brotherhood, and whose devotion to its interests no one doubts who knows him.—Editor.]

It seems utterly indifferent to the human creatures which move like ants about its base. It rises 4,300 feet above the beautiful bay. Anciently it was very decent. Strabo writes of it: "Mount Vesuvius is covered with beautiful meadows with the exception of the summit;" but fifty years later came a terrible earthquake, A. D. 63, and seriously damaged all the region round about, especially Herculaneum and Pompeii. This was repeated in 64 and August 24, 79, during the reign of Titus, came the appalling disaster to the cities at the base when Pliny perished, and 2,000 were buried at Pompeii, the whole city covered with a layer of ashes and then of pumice stones, twenty feet in depth. Many eruptions have been recorded since, 59 in all, and thousands of lives lost. The last severe one was in 1895. There are premonitory earthquakes, day is turned into night, extraordinary agitation of the sea, dense clouds riven by incessant flashes of lightning, the emission of fire and ashes, descent of streams of lava, and clouds of smoke, ashes and stones, and of sulphurous fumes. Stones have been thrown fifteen miles, and hurled 2,000 feet in the air, showers of ashes carried as far as Constantinople. No doubt there is some connection between the mountain and sea, and water temporarily admitted to the burning liquids of the interior of the earth causes the earthquake and vapours and gases that force out the red hot fluid called lava, which reaches 2,000 degrees of heat.

It was a great experience to ascend the mountain and come within a short distance of the blazing crater and these fiery streams of lava. It is, indeed, a vision of the bottomless pit. Along the sides as we go up are at first luxuriant vineyards, gardens and orchards. The famous "Lacrimæ Christi" wine is made here. Higher up we reach huge dark lava streams of past eruptions and magnificent prospects open on every hand. The last 1,300 feet is accomplished by a wire rope railway, which seems to go up almost perpendicularly. The gradient is from 43:100 to 63:100. From this great elevation, 3,900 feet, one gets a great sweep of vision. The mighty mountain at his feet; the great streams and floods of the dark lava of different centuries, with all manner of twisted and contorted forms, serpents and dragons and billows and cataracts, as they have poured red hot down the mountain side and then hardened in myriads of grotesque shapes; the glorious panorama, with Capri, where the deified beast Tiberius stamped the hoof prints of illustrious crime, and Sorrento, the birthplace of Torquato Tasso, "village of flowers and flower of villages"; and the buried cities, and long line of white towns clustering about the base of the mountain and clinging to the hills; and the great city with its steeples and domes; the towering island of Ischia on the right, and whole magnificent coast line and broad expanse of water stretching away to the far horizon; and back of us, the smoking crater and hot lava streams; and away beyond, the Campanian Plain merging into the purple haze of the snow capped Apennines. As we gazed on this radiant picture by a curious atmospheric effect a form of Fata Morgana was seen—the islands seemed lifted out of the water and suspended between earth and sky; and as the sun became lower, through the slight cloud, it formed lakes of molten silver here and there on the blue surface of the matchless bay; and then, later, lakes of molten gold. It was a great day, my day on Vesuvius and I turned with regret from the vision of the red glare on its summit at night to seek my steamer bunk.

ARCHER.

Eyda Gertrude Archer, daughter of Mrs. Geo. W. Brown, of Jubbulpore, India, died in Landour, May 28, 1906, aged 21 years. H. C. Sarm and D. O. Cunningham conducted the services.

AYLSWORTH.

Nancy Margaret (Oatman) Aylsworth, wife of Bro. N. J. Aylsworth, died near Auburn, N. Y., June 28, 1906. Sister Aylsworth was in her seventieth year, and had lived with her husband over forty-three years. The writer has known her nearly thirty years. She deserves honorable mention in our papers, both for her Christian character and, as the wife of her gifted husband, author of "Moral and Spiritual Aspects of Baptism." As many brethren know, Brother Aylsworth became physically disabled through insidious disease about twenty-five years ago. His crippled condition greatly increased the family burdens. During all these years of his misfortune Sister A. has been a patient, uncomplaining Christian wife and mother doing what she could to encourage her husband and care for her household. She has been truly a model of unselfish devotion during these years of trial. The writer was glad to say to mourners and friends at her funeral, that her weary soul was at rest; that she belonged to that great company of God's elect for whom victory over death had been procured by the Lord Jesus Christ; that he who conquered death and brought life and immortality to light had been her Savior during most of her life; that she could join with Christ's disciples everywhere in the joyful acclaim, "thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." The lonely and decrepit husband, the son and two daughters left behind will mourn, trusting in the divine promise of eternal victory. May God greatly bless and comfort them.

A. B. Chamberlain, Minister.

BAXTER.

John R. Baxter was born January 28, 1828, near Palmyra, Mo. He was baptized in Salt River in 1856, by Elder Wilkes, and during a half century cherished the faith and practiced the works of a Christian. For over thirty years he occupied the position of elder in Ariel and later Huntington congregations, being a witness and an assistant to the beginning, growth and development of the ministries of G. A. and J. M. Hoffmann, Chas. Winders, G. W. Buckner, E. M. Richmond, J. P. Myers, H. F. Davis, and others. It was his custom to bear one-half of the expenses of the home congregation, and in missionary interest he was never lacking. He passed away Lord's day evening, July 8, 1906, leaving a wife, four children, nineteen grandchildren and four great-grandchildren. Funeral services were held in Huntington church, conducted by the writer, after which the body was buried in Monroe City cemetery.

Amarillo, July 19.—Have just closed a two-weeks' meeting at Canyon City, with sixteen additions, seven by baptism, one reclaimed and eight by letter. The church has a fine pastor in J. L. Stockard. His salary was increased $15 per month in appreciation of his good work. Many of his members are readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, which they feel is a great factor in their Christian growth.—Jewell Howard.

[It is always a great factor wherever read.—ED.]

Devine, July 16.—A fine and growing interest. Four confessions. Move out on the church lawn to-night.—D. D. Boyle, evangelist.

Greenville, July 16.—Our meeting with J. L. Haddock and Frank C. Houston, evangelists, closed last night with thirty-nine additions.—J. W. Holsapple.

Austin, July 15.—During this month twenty-two have been added to the Central Christian Church, of this city, twelve by confession and baptism, two restored and the rest by letter. It is a mistake to suppose that Christian work can not be carried on in southern cities during the hot weather.—J. W. Lowber.

Lampassas, July 19.—Have just closed an encouraging meeting at Kerrville, Tex. There were twenty-seven additions, over one-half being conversions. Miss Grace Plummer conducted the singing in an able manner. Members in this lovely summer resort are moving forward hopefully for larger things.—W. A. Boggess.

WHAT THE PUBLISHERS SAY.

A strong and original plea for the Simple Religion that is unencumbered by the artificiality of man-made creeds and denominational divisions, which simply adopts Christ and His teachings in their original clearness, comprehensiveness, and purity.

For the Clergyman, a book full of stimulating and suggestive thought on the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. The reasoning is clear, logical, forceful; the whole work is intensely Biblical, and reverently loyal to Christian doctrine throughout; a help and strength to every minister.

For the Layman, a book of striking, original thought on the most vital and perplexing subject before the religious thinkers of the present generation. A book with the charm of simple fact and clear statement written by a practical man of wide commercial and political experience.

WHAT INDIVIDUALS SAY.

The Church of Christ, by a layman, contains a very clear statement on the Bible, which every teacher and trainer of the young and others should * * * consider. * * * In a simple and forceful way he unfolds the great truths of the Sacred Volume. R. S. Latimer, President Western Pennsylvania Christian Missionary Society, Pittsburg, Pa.

"It is an intelligent, candid, earnest, and meritorious study of the most vital subject that can engage a rational mind. There are passages in the discussion in which the writer rises to real eloquence. I hail such a work from such a source with grateful satisfaction." —WILLIAM CLEAVER WILKINSON, Professor of Poetry and Criticism, University of Chicago.

"It is the greatest religious book so far published in the twentieth century."—M. M. COCHRAN, Attorney at Law, Uniontown, Pa.

Heaven-Sent Message to the Churches

"I have just read 'The Church of Christ' by a Layman. I am delighted and elated with it. This unknown author has served all Christendom. Men of all faiths will hail with enthusiasm this volume and its messages to men. The author has placed the world's religions before us as so many pebbles, and after showing the utter imbecility of all save one he takes up the pearl of great price and with a stroke recounts the triumphs of Christ and the cross through His church. Any Christian living a thousand miles from any church could take this book and with its description of the church and its references to the Bible organize the Church of Christ and invite men of any faith to meet in Him. It is a timely volume. May the dear Lord bless the Layman and his heaven-sent message to the churches."—Charles Reign Scoville, A. M., LL. D., Evangelist, Chicago, Ill.

All in All to Me It Is a Great Book

"'The Church of Christ' is like a pearl of great price in a setting of gold. We have nothing in our literature in my judgment at all comparable to it. For a clear, logical, comprehensive, and Scriptural exposition of the New Testament revelation of the origin, principles, purposes, and organization of the Church of Christ as God's agency in this world for the redemption of lost men it fills a place peculiarly its own and from which, in my judgment, it will not soon be removed. . . . It is timely. It is a book greatly needed at this particular juncture when the truly good and religious people of all denominations seem to be feeling darkly for some solid foundation upon which to rebuild a united church; and if it can secure anything like the circulation its worth merits it will certainly prove a large factor in bringing about the fulfilment of the Savior's prayer and the desire of all truly pious hearts. The book is first-class literature, lofty in thought, pure and elegant in diction, attractive in style, comprehensive in range, with brevity of statement, punctuated with eloquent perorations and beautiful climaxes. It commands the attention of the thoughtful reader from chapter first to the finish. All in all to me it is a great book."—Elder William F. Cowden, Tacoma, Washington. .. ..

"This book is a work of great merit, and I trust it may be circulated by the millions."—A. McLean, President Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, Ohio.

"The perusal of its pages produces a sensation akin to that felt by a weary, thirsty traveler, who had drank from many stagnant pools, but suddenly came upon a living spring. It meets the imperative demand of the hour."—Thomes C. Daniels, Y. M. C. A. Sec'y, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

WORDS OF PRAISE FROM FAR-OFF COUNTRIES.

Can Scarcely Be Excelled

"I have read with deep interest 'The Church of Christ.' The author's exegesis is remarkably clear and satisfactory. Some passages can scarcely be excelled for strength and beauty by any in the English language."—J. M. W. Farnham, D. D., Corresponding Secretary of the Chinese Tract Society, Shanghai, China.

Lets in the Pure Sunlight of God's Saving Truth

"The writer of this every way admirable book is, we are informed by the publisher, 'A Distinguished Layman.' But that this author is distinguished for something more than 'commerce' and 'politics,' all who read the volume will be quick to perceive. He is distinguished for his simple yet robust faith in, and thorough grasp of, the truth as it is in Jesus; for his splendid powers of generalization, and for his conspicuous ability to impart what he knows in plain and forcible Anglo-Saxon, so that all may understand and appreciate it. The book is precisely what is needed at the present juncture, not only under the Stars and Stripes, but away here in the land of 'The Golden Fleece,' under the Southern Cross. It is the finest compendium of the matters relating to Salvation, both on its Godward and manward sides, that we have seen. We venture to predict for it a great future—not alone in circulation—but in the work it will be destined to accomplish. This book will, more than any volume that has appeared in our language, tend to break up the fog-banks of theological mysticism, and let in the pure sunlight of God's saving truth to many a darkened mind and heart. Moreover, it is brimful of points for preachers, and the one who makes a study of 'The Church of Christ' will never be at a loss for stirring themes for effective Gospel Sermons."—Charles Watt, Auckland, New Zealand.

A Pleasant Surprise and Promiseful Prophecy

"That 'A Layman' should choose such a theme and handle it so well is a pleasant surprise and promiseful prophecy. I am glad the book has been written and published. It is attractively printed, highly readable, and will turn the attention of many again to the original sources of evangelistic endeavor."—W. W. Coebrane, Asipaw, N. Shan States, Burma.

WHAT THE RELIGIOUS PAPERS SAY.

"Theologically and ecclesiastically this book is the book of the twentieth century, so far. It will take rank with 'Ecce Homo' and 'Ecce Deus' as an epoch-maker. It is written by a cultured and constructive mind, is free from cant, provincialism, and iconoclasticism. It is an instruction—it is an inspiration. . . . The pulpit has lectured the pew long enough, now let us hear from the pew. It is a treat for the pulpit to hear from such a source in such a way, and no less for the fellow pew-holders."—Claris Yuell in "The Christian Standard," Cincinnati, Ohio.

"From a literary standpoint the book is a gem. . . . It is really a remarkable book."—"Christian Union," Des Moines, Iowa.

"We trust this book may find a wide circulation."—"Missionary Tidings," Indianapolis, Ind.

Succinct and Satisfying

"The book covers a wide scope. It is written in a very succinct and satisfactory style. An impartial and serious examination of this volume will aid in the solution of the most trying and tremendous problems which confront our modern church."—F. D. Power in the "Christian-Evangelist," St. Louis, Mo.

Eloquence Has Never Been Surpassed

" . . . Divine things have never been handled with a more reverent touch. . . . There is not a suggestion of the combative spirit, or of what Longfellow has well called 'the struggle for triumph more than truth.' . . . The closing chapter is one whose eloquence has never been surpassed."—"The Christian Worker," Pittsburg, Pa.

The Work of a Genius

"It is the work of a layman who is certainly a man of large culture and genius and for the present is anonymous."—"The Christian Advocate," St. Louis, Mo.

Based on the Bible

"The warp and woof of the whole argument are drawn from the Bible liberally quoted."—"Outlook," New York city.

A Clear Defense of Christianity

" . . . This book is a clear defense of the history and fundamental doctrines of Christianity. . . . There is a very strong tendency on the part of many good people to discard all church organizations, and this book, while faithfully enforcing fundamental truth, will strongly emphasize that trend." Baltimore "Methodist," Baltimore, Md.

DUTY, PRIVILEGE AND EXCUSES.

> "Swift fly the hours, and brief the time,
> For action or repose;
> Fast flits this scene of woe and crime,
> And soon the whole shall close.
> The evening shadows deeper fall,
> The daylight dies away.
> Wake slumberer, at thy Master's call,
> And work while it is day!"

It is easy for us to see the self-deception in the excuses others frame for evasion of duty, but wily old Satan usually blinds us to that in our own which is very apparent to our neighbors. Let us realize that we are being victimized into any turning aside from the commands of our Father.

The Christian in whose lexicon is found neither "excuse" nor any of its synonyms, but who does his whole duty as he is given light to see it, is the one daily deriving supreme delight from earthly privileges and is joyfully looking forward to their higher consummations in heaven.

The man who would rather prove his oxen than to banquet with his Lord is one whom business is destroying. The man who would rather survey his fields than commune with Jesus has let riches bar him out of the kingdom. The one who plead his marriage as a reason for spurning the Son of God will never know the sweetest meaning of home here on earth, and will have no mansion up yonder.

Physical healing at the hands of the Great Physician is unquestionably one of the boons peculiar to the children of God. It is a blessing, too, we should seek within the Church of Christ, rather than within any semisecular organization that has attached "church" to its title simply because of the hold the name has on the affections of the people, or within the membership of any ethical cult. It is our privilege to pray for health, as it is the delight of angels to bring it in their wings.

Bishop Usher, whose sacred chronology is printed in the margin of most of our Bibles, was one time preaching to a great audience in London, when a messenger from the despotic king James commanded his immmediately coming to the palace. The preacher replied: "I am engaged in the more important business of the greater King. When I have finished my duty to him, then I shall come." This same spirit, even in attenuated form, applied now would send us to many a prayer-meeting on evenings when we regard an invitation to a social as more imperative. Which is greater, God or our society leaders?

Lord Horatio Nelson, who "flamed amazement on the world by a series of noble deeds in the lustre of which all other naval glory looks pale," won his crowning victory at Trafalgar, where the French and Spanish naval power was broken and their hopes of invading England became merely a dream of departed greatness, largely through this appeal quietly signaled from ship to ship—"England expects every man to do his duty today." The performance of duty is a constitutional impulse in all right natures. As religious teachers and exemplars we are acting most wisely when kindly making known their duty to men and bringing them to a square decision as to whether they will accept or reject it. If we will look to our great Captain's flagship we can easily discern angels signaling to us through these present day conflicts. "Heaven expects every soldier of the cross to do his duty to-day."

FALSE EXCUSES—Luke 14:15-24.

Golden Text.—And they all with one consent began to make excuse.—Luke 14:18.

It was at the same dinner at the Pharisee's house where the preceding discourse about humility was spoken, that Jesus gave this parable about the unwilling guests. The figure, in this case, was drawn directly from the situation before him. He was at a feast. The occasion suggested to one of the guests the pious thought that even the best of earthly banquets in the most congenial company, is nothing as compared to the joys of that day when the righteous shall sit down to the banquet of eternal glory in the Kingdom of God. "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God."

Jesus took up the figure and elaborated it into a parable. Blessed indeed shall it be to sit down at that heavenly feast. But strangely enough, many of those who are invited will not come. There is a strange contrast between the eternal advantages of seeking the things of the Kingdom of God, and the reluctance of men to accept these advantages. John Bunyan expressed the same fact in his story of the man with the muck-rake, so busy with the foul things in which he had learned to take pleasure that he had no time to lift his eyes to see the angel holding over his head a glittering crown which would be his for looking up and reaching up.

So these people who were bidden to the feast lost the greater blessedness in the too eager pursuit of lesser things. It was not that the things which they did were bad. In fact, they were all good things to do. It is good to buy fields and to go to see them. It is good to buy oxen and to work them. It is certainly good to marry a wife. There are some temptations which, to people of decent inclinations, are more subtle and dangerous than the temptation to indulge in vice. Things good in themselves but misused; activities which in themselves are commendable, but which are allowed to crowd out more important concerns—these are the most potent dangers of our time. The engrossing demands of business, the requirements of social life, the things which are good and important but not best and most important, are a snare to many souls. At another time Jesus said, "Seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things (food, clothing and other temporal goods) shall be added to you." The lesson is the same as that of this parable of the feast and the unwilling guests. Do not imagine that the pursuit of good things is a valid excuse for failure to seek the best.

PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD.—Luke 20:9-16.

"Kind Father, look with pity now
On one by sin defiled;
While at thy mercy-seat I bow,
O bless thine erring child!

"My struggles, Lord, to do thy will,
How poor and weak they are!
But thou art gracious to me still,
Then hear my humble prayer."

Those men were not profited by their wicked withholding of tribute and their murdering the servants and heir. Had they first dealt honestly with the owner, all things would have been added unto them. That principle obtains today. In rejecting God's overtures to us for some returns in goodness and love and helpfulness in redeeming the earth as compensation for what he gives us, we are preparing for our own expulsion from the vineyard here and barring ourselves from the Canaan above.

In the remark that the proprietor went into another country for a long time, Jesus refers to the withholding of visible manifestations of God's presence and power in the midst of the people in order that they might not be consciously overawed by them, but have opportunity for the development of faith and moral responsibility. He never did really withdraw from Israel or any other nation. The Godless nations have all withdrawn from him. He is never far from any of us who will have to do with him.

It is well to note that by killing the servants, these husbandmen so inured themselves to crime that when it seemed to their advantage, they scrupled not to murder the son and heir. So with us. Now there are sanctities we would not violate but neglecting giving, Bible reading, and fraternal solicitude today, tomorrow we absent ourselves from worship, neglect prayer, forget heaven, and soon we are found scoffing at the judgment, trampling the blood of Jesus under our feet, and crucifying anew the Lord of Glory.

Our Judge is not capricious and cruel. Not only do men anticipate his judgments, but approve them. "What therefore shall the lord of the vineyard do unto them?" asked Jesus. Matthew (21:41) tells us they replied: "He will miserably destroy those miserable husbandmen and will let out the vineyard unto other husbandmen, who shall render him the fruits in their seasons." All will recognize the justice in the findings of the last day. Sinners will not be driven to their doom; constitutional, inherent, powers of the souls will impel them there.

The servants sent to collect just tribute from the husbandmen were the prophets who at different periods of the nation's history went forth to restore right relations between God and his people. Their coming was not gladly welcomed by the lords of the vineyard nor were they returned fullhanded to their master. Their reception is indicated in the Savior's sad apostrophe, O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killeth the prophets and stoneth them that are sent unto her! Had these messengers been received in manner befitting their mission, like all the angels of God, whether of life or death, they would have left blessings infinitely more valuable than any treasure they would bear away.

The vineyard of our parable is the truths of God and righteousness which Jehovah implanted in the hearts of ancient Israel. Under the culture of kings and judges, priests and Levites and the influence of the temple service he instituted he had a right to expect a fruitage of goodness and brotherly love and nobility of character that would soon have peopled the earth with his worshippers. If the great Husbandman could be said to have cherished such expectations they were doomed to cruel disappointment. The bigotry of their leaders isolated the Jews from other nations and prevented the knowledge of their God from filling the earth, while hypocrisy and cant in high places blighted holiness and true worship all over the land. Never was rich sowing rewarded with poorer harvest.

Of Baby's Torturing, Disfiguring Humor Use Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment.

Every child born into the world with an inherited tendency to torturing, disfiguring humors of the skin and scalp becomes an object of the most tender solicitude, not only because of its suffering, but because of the dreadful fear that the disfiguration is to be lifelong and mar its future happiness and prosperity. Hence it becomes the duty of mothers of such afflicted children to acquaint themselves with the best, the purest, and most effective treatment available, viz.: warm baths with Cuticura Soap, and gentle anointings with Cuticura Ointment, the great Skin Cure. TABLE TALKS OF JESUS. By L. G. Broughton. (Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago. 50 cts. net.)

As the title indicates the book consists of expositions of the sayings of Jesus as he sat "at meat" and as he "broke bread" with personal friends and others when he dwelt among men. There are eleven of these talks extending from the marriage feast past the memorial supper and on to the promise of the Father.

THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

The reading of this little volume by Errett Gates, Ph. D., has been a distinct inspiration to me as a preacher. It is a good thing for one immersed in the details of pastoral duties to get the larger view and the general trend of our history here set forth. It gives an uplift, a thrill, a power, to our present duties to be had in no other way. The volume gives a clear and satisfactory account of our early history and of the fundamental principles which guided the fathers of our church. It would be difficult to improve on this part of the narrative. Dr. Gates has been a careful student of our history and is familiar with his theme. He has the historical spirit and method which makes it a pleasure to follow him. He has, too, in a pre-eminent degree the spirit of fairness. He does not write as a partisan, but as an unbiased historian. To be sure, part of the book is not pleasant reading, but this is not altogether the author's fault. He has given the facts. But the true historian must also give a proper interpretation of facts. Too much emphasis is here put upon controversial matters. Every religious movement has had its full share of this. It is simply the "gnawing pains" incident to all development. In spite of all controversies we have never ceased to be practically one body—and this can be affirmed of very few denominations now in existence. A glowing chapter might be written on the constructive work we have done as a people, the positive contribution we have made to the religious life of our time and the grand men of God who have been produced by the creative ideal for which we stand. The author groups our history into three divisions, under three prominent leaders: (1) Alexander Campbell. This was the period of laying the foundations. Mr. Campbell was not an organizer like John Wesley, not an evangelist like Whitefield; he was a great Christian statesman, logician and orator. A clear conception of the fundamentals of religion, a masterly statement and an invincible logic were the elements of his power. This was the period of discussion and gradual separation into a distinct organization. (2) Isaac Errett. In this period the missionary spirit was developed and missionary organization perfected. It represents a distinct advance over the first period and marks our entrance as a great factor among the forces making for the evangelization of the world. (3) This period under the leadership of such men as J. H. Garrison, shows a deepening of the spiritual life of our churches and the development of a spirit of co-operation with other religious bodies for the carrying of the Gospel to the ends of the earth. It marks the passing from the discussion to the practice of Christian union. As the author says: "There has come to some of the best spirits of the denomination a new and intense appreciation of its mission as a Christian union movement. They feel that its chief justification for existence as a separate body lies in what it can contribute toward the union of Christians in this generation. They are not content to wait for the consummation of a far-off, ideal union in some future generation, but desire to prepare the way for it by a larger co-operation and freedom of relationship with other bodies, in the present generation." The book is worthy of a wide and careful reading.

Sunset at Pentwater.

BY BERTHA M. BRAY, A LITTLE GIRL. *

When the busy day is ended,
  And the shades of eve draw near,
When all Nature's voices, blended,
  Fall like music on the ear,
Then we love to cross the sand hills,
  Stroll along the sandy shore,
Gaze out o'er the lake's wide vista,
  Listen to its billows roar.

Then we love to watch the sunset,
  As it slowly sinks to rest,
Painting all the clouds with glory,
  Hov'ring round the golden west.
Having run its race with patience,
  Now it sinks beneath the waves,
Sending back its farewell glances,
  And a golden pathway paves.

So may we, our life-work finished,
  Close as gently our brief day,
Leaving rays of light behind us,
  Showing other souls the way.
From the sun we learn this lesson:
  Let us shine our journey through,
And departing leave behind us
  Light to guide our neighbors, too.

PART III.

CHAPTER IV.

Mrs. Bannerton kindly consented to buy the garments essential to Rhoda, and in the evening, Raymund, accompanied by his sister, left the lodging house to seek a restaurant. Raymund was eager in his desire to find employment in the city. "There are so very many stores in Kansas City," he reasoned, "that some of them must need a boy." Rhoda was not very hopeful. She said, "I don't think there is much hope of your getting a place, Ray, as long as you show that you are from the country."

"How do I show it?" he asked.

"It is perfectly dear to me," said Rhoda, smiling at him as they passed along Thirteenth Street, "but business men look at everything in a businesslike way. No, we mustn't stop to look at those boys"—in a high yard three boys were playing ball and a girl, evidently their sister was trying to make them miss a catch, and all were laughing delightedly—"and you mustn't stop to look in the store window."

"I sometimes see the city people stop, to look in the store windows," said Raymund.

"I know it," said Rhoda, "but they are looking for something, and you are just looking because everything is strange to you. It makes a different kind of look, somehow. I don't know how to explain it. And now—no, Raymund, you must not look so friendly at these poor old creatures we meet, and you must not take off your hat if a person looks at you!"

"Very well," said Raymund, "I guess I can learn this just as I learned Latin."

"You must look all the time as if you were going somewhere, as if it were important for you not to be late, and as if you took no interest whatever in the sights about you. These people we meet, pass along these same pavements day after day, year after year. They know how everything looks till they are sick of it all, or anyway, bored by it, and nothing can interest them in it again. And when they see you smiling at what is all monotony to them, and taking interest in things that they consider just the necessary evils of a city's routine, they know you are from a place where people don't see things; and that place is the country!"

"Thank you," said Raymund. "Go right on, Rhoda."

"You will find another thing, Ray," said Rhoda gently; "the walks are so built, that they are level, and you don't have to plant your feet so securely. You won't stumble over any clods, you know." She laughed up at him, and Raymund, taking all this in jolly spirits, laughed aloud, and some men turned around to see what was the matter. When they saw Raymund, although he had left the green umbrella at the lodging-house, they knew instantly that he was from the distant prairie-lands of Missouri.

Rhoda had as little experience of city-restaurants as Raymund, and when their meal was ended, the youth was rather aghast at the bill; but he did not betray his feelings to Rhoda. "It's all right," he assured her, as they returned to the lodging-house, "we'll stick it out this week, for I believe I can get a good position here; and I don't see any use of going back to Crawley; everybody knows there's no work to be had in Crawley. There's one thing I want you to promise me, Rhoda, and that is, never to leave Mrs. Bannerton's lodging-house, unless you go out with me, or with Mrs. Bannerton." Rhoda promised this readily enough, for she had a fear of the people who had threatened her at Mrs. Van Estry's, and particularly of the young man whose brutal, drunken face she could not drive from her memory.

The next few days taught Raymund more about seeking employment in the city, than he could have learned from half-a-dozen magazine articles, illustrations and all. It was not the worst feature about the occupation, that he was invariably refused a position; it was the rude unkindness with which he was treated. There was always the hope ahead that at last some business house might accept his services. But the insulting rejections, the gruff surliness, the supercilious scorn, the sneering politeness, bowed his healthful spirit. He and Rhoda tried one restaurant after another, seeking one where reasonable rates were combined with good cooking, and at their little table, he would talk over his failures, never dismally, or complainingly, but quite frankly. At night the tall narrow walls of his little bedroom looked down upon him as if to say, "No luck, hey?" And the meaningless end of lead pipe would seem to squint at him through the ceiling, and the lights as seen from his bed would give a sense of remoteness as if to say, "You do not belong to our world. Why do you not go back to clover fields and rippling brooks?" But in the morning, the sunlight would speak of cheer. So Raymund would cautiously pour from his wire-bound pitcher and set it gently down, and wash away a night's uneasiness. But each day told the same story—tramp, tramp, tramp over hard pavements—blistered feet—unkind refusals—a heavy heart,—and back to Rhoda. One interview with an employer went to the length of Raymund's being asked, "Well, what can you do?" That was his crowning success of the week.

On the last afternoon, Raymund was on the east of Main street going from one crowded place of business to another, when he came face to face with the man whom he had discovered watching his bed-room window. Seen so near, the middle-aged man was much more repulsive. The story of a bad life, was to be read in his eyes. Raymund instinctively paused.

"Raymund," said the man abruptly, "I want to talk business with you a few minutes. Come over here." He jerked his thumb in the direction of a vacant lot at the back of a small drygoods store.

"I am busy," said Raymund, amazed that his name should be known to the other.

"So am I," said the man with a grin. "Boggs is my name. Glad to meet you. I've heard your sister speak of you, and you two look so much alike, I couldn't help knowing you. It's to your interest to talk to me a little while. I know you're both staying at Mrs. Bannerton's, and I can give you considerable trouble, both of you."

"You can give us no trouble," said Raymund, but his heart sank, "and if you do not leave us alone, I will turn you over to the police."

"All right," said Boggs, "there's one now. Do you want me to call him for you?"

"I will hear what you have to say," said

REGIMENTAL REUNIONS AND FORTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY BATTLE CHICKAMAUGA,

CHATTANOOGA, SEPTEMBER 18-20, 1906.

On September 18, 1906, will occur the forty-third anniversary of the Battle of Chickamauga. It is proposed to celebrate this memorable event with a reunion of the various regiments that participated in this memorable battle and the various battles fought around Chattanooga. This reunion will be held at Chickamauga National Park, September 18, 19 and 20, and the present indications are that it will be the largest and most notabe gathering ever held in the South. On the above dates, the remnants from the armies of twelve states, comprising the following: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Kentucky, will assemble, many for the first and last time since they marched from its blood-stained fields, forty-three years ago.

Here is one of the great opportunities for the education of the youth. Don't fail to take your children and show them historic Chattanooga, with all its historical connections. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Go and see the old war generals and other officers point out the places of interest on the battlefield; let them show you and explain, in person, the markers erected on the battlefield showing the positions of the opposing armies at the time of battle. It will not be long until none will be left to do this noble work.

It will be many years, if ever again, that such an opportunity will present itself. See that your tickets read via the Louisville & Nashville R. R., the Battlefield Route. Call on your nearest railroad agent for rates and advertising matter pertaining to the reunion, or write nearest representative of the Louisville & Nashville R. R.

Raymund, and they walked to the vacant lot.

"It's this," said Boggs. "Your sister made it a steady thing to steal laces and silks from three of the biggest stores in the city. She sold them to a second-hand store on Ninth street. That store finally got uneasy about the goods she kept bringing and they sent word to Mrs. Van Estry—that's where Rhoda worked—to ask how the girl came by all that rich stuff. Some of Mrs. Van Estry's friends were there at the time. I was, for one. Mrs. Van Estry sent for Rhoda and asked her about it right there before us all. Rhoda burst into tears and confessed that she had been stealing for over a year. Well, we all felt so sorry for the girl that we didn't know what to do. We didn't want her sent to jail, so Mrs. Van Estry took back the last things that had been stolen, to the store, and begged the proprietor not to prosecute Rhoda. But he was so mad, he sent the police right to our house; and then we found out that Rhoda had run away. The police are looking everywhere for her, but she is so different since she got new clothes and fixed herself up, that one of them saw you and her going into a restaurant yesterday, and didn't recognize her from Mrs. Van Estry's description. But I know her, and can give her up in a minute. Now to business. I want some money from you, to keep mum about where she is. You've got some in your shoes, and you needn't deny it. I can tell because I've watched how you walk and how you, every now and then, look down to see if they ain't leaking. So pony up. Here is a nice respectable vacant lot, and you can take off your shoes without bringing a blush to the cheek of the most fastidious."

"I know very well," said Raymund, "and I believe you know, that my sister never stole anything in her life, and that she is the kind of girl that couldn't do that sort of thing. You are trying to put on her what others have done."

"It don't matter what you think, or what I think," said Boggs gently, persuasively, even kindly. "It's what will the district station do, when you and Rhoda are dragged before it and we all troop down there as witnesses. I don't care what kind of a girl Rhoda is, but I do care about the money in your shoes. So shell it out, Raymund, my boy, and luck to you, and the stars and stripes over all!" We cannot, of course, know what the reader would have done in Raymund's position, though we have our opinion. What Raymund did, was to sit down upon the edge of the embankment, extract a ten-dollar bill from his right shoe and another from his left, and hand them to Mr. Boggs. "Now," said the evil-browed fellow, pocketing the money, "I will say farewell; and should we ever meet again, old chap, try to make it convenient to have a few more bills in your shoes or there'll be trouble. What a boy you are, carrying ten-dollar bills in your shoes! How odd! Odd, but handy!" He chuckled, squinted his eyes at Raymund with a vile narrowing of the lids, and slouched away. Raymund made all haste to Mrs. Bannerton's and told Rhoda in breathless phrases what had happened. "We must leave the city immediately," he panted. "Back to Crawley—anywhere to get away from that villain!" Rhoda shared his panic. There was a hasty parting with Mrs. Bannerton who was sympathetic, but helpless in their behalf. Their belongings were hastily placed in a small bundle, and once more the green umbrella set forth upon its adventures. Their hurrying feet passed Convention Hall, huge, barnlike, meaningless to Raymund, and later the Grace Episcopal church, whose Norman beauty never failed to impress the youth no matter how heavy of heart. They turned into Washington street, neither real sure of the way, but confident of the general direction toward the Union Station. They hurried down the Twelfth street incline, whence they could see innumerable trains from among which, one might be then on its way to Crawley. From the state line the street car track brought them to their destination, exhausted, frightened, but determined to put themselves out of the power of Mrs. Van Estry, Boggs and the other conspirators. They learned with dismay that there was no train for Crawley till the next morning. It was now half-past-seven, and although still light in the streets, the station was in a glaze of electric lights. "We will have to stay here all night," said Rhoda piteously, to the official whom she had questioned.

"There will be plenty of people here all night," said the official. "Go over yonder in the end, and get a rocking-chair as soon as somebody gets up out of one, and you'll be all right."

Just then a heavy man with white hair entered the door and bawled out in a stentorian voice a long string of cities familiar to a student of geography, adding, "Train on the third track!" As soon as his voice ceased, there was a wild scramble toward the glass doors opening upon the platform. Rhoda and Raymund were jostled to one side. "I guess we'll have to wait here," said Raymund, "There's such a crowd, I don't believe Boggs could find us, if he were here looking for us." And they made their way toward the far end of the spacious waiting-room.

Advance Society Letters.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

Come to our ice cream social, August 3rd!

But I must tell you about my Fourth of July. That has always been a big holiday with me, but on the Fourth just past, I expected little special enjoyment because I live so far away from the friends with whom I used to shoot off firecrackers. In the morning I started down town and it seemed that everybody was going away on a picnic—except one. Bentonville didn't celebrate, and it was so quiet in town that you could almost hear the weeds growing along the sidewalks. I went to the postoffice and there is a store in the same building, of course; but all the firecrackers were sold out. You couldn't get a thing in town to make a noise with. Even the mail hadn't come in. Nothing was happening except young people climbing into picnic wagons with big baskets. So I went home; and of a sudden here came a special messenger boy bringing me a package just expressed from Moberly, Mo. It was full of flowers,—pansies, oh! so many, many beautiful pansies, and mignonette and fern—they crowded a big bowl. They had been sent me by a person I had never seen; and when I went down to the postoffice again, there was a letter for me; it was as beautiful as the flowers. It, too, was from some one I have never seen. I just sat there feeling good. I liked it better than fireworks. So I had a big Fourth of July, after all. Reader, did you give somebody a good Fourth of July—I don't mean a kinsman or intimate friend, but somebody who had no special claim upon you? The letter—but I can't give it to you, for its perfume would all be dissipated in print. And right there where I was reading this letter, a man came up and invited me to his picnic. We ate on the ground in the shade of the forest trees, and there was laughter and fried chicken. When I came back to town I saw them putting up the big tent for the Chautauqua Assembly. I felt like they were putting up that tent principally for me and orphan Charlie; for you will remember Charlie was invited to visit me during the Chautauqua, the first day of which was July 6th.

I wish all of you who have ever sent me money for Charlie's support, could have been at the station to have welcomed him when he came in from St. Louis the morning of the 6th! Wouldn't we have waved our handkerchiefs and shouted and shaken hands! Nearly every state in the Union would have been represented, besides various divisions of Canada, Japan, China, England, Constantinople, South America, Mexico, and if I've left out any country that should be named, I hope it won't feel bad. So Charlie came 10 hours before I was expecting him, and I find him much improved. We have been going to the Chautauqua three times a day; it ended last night and I am tired. We heard Champ Clark and Gov. Hoch, and Lieut. Hobson, and Geo. Bain and Col. Ham, and Dixon, to say nothing of the moving pictures and illustrated lectures. Now some people don't know how to get the most good out of an illustrated lecture. They sit there in the darkness and they realize that the pictures are beautiful. Yet, somehow, they are always tired when it is over. And this is the secret of coming away from such an entertainment rested and pleased; always carry some cotton with you, and when the lecturer begins with "Now, come with me," stuff it in your ears.

You want to hear about the Av. S. orphan, I am sure. Well, he is quite tall, and looks like the picture that appeared in this paper not so very long ago. As he has lived in St. Louis so many years, right in the heart of the city, he of course thinks that a town like Bentonville is a very small place indeed, and I suspect he imagines that we might blow out the gas if we went to the city, or get run over by a street car, or turn pale in an elevator. He is very kind, however, about keeping all this to himself, and does not make a show of his immense city experience. I find, too, that he is rather strong in his political convictions, and is inclined to believe that those who belong to the other party do not like the country quite so well as he does, and that if they get the man in for president next time that you hear a good deal about, there would be a long dry spell in Kansas; but while he thinks these things, he doesn't say them, and as it will be seven years before he can vote, I think by that time he will have learned what many an older head does not understand; that our great political parties were not made for the purpose of fighting each other, but because each thinks its plan of blessing America is the best plan. Charlie is fond of music and I am sorry to say he has not had any music lessons the past year because we couldn't afford to pay for his lessons, and the lady who formerly gave him lessons free, has moved away. If he could have more lessons he could learn to play. He can already pick out the hymns by note, and considering his disadvantages, does well. He can play homemade accompaniments to my violin. We also play chess together. As I write these words, Charlie is lying in the hammock in our back yard. There is a plum tree to the right of him and a different variety to the left. The big ripe plums lie in the grass in great number, but Charlie doesn't even look at them. In fact he has seen as many as he wants to see, for the present.

He has been pushing the lawn mower. It is remarkable how he can get that lawn mower over the ground till all the back yard is mowed, when so many boys with ever so many legs cannot be connected with the handle of a lawn mower. So, as I was saying, Charlie is lying in the hammock under the shade of the old apple tree between the two plum trees. Felix sits near solemnly waving his tail at the extreme tip of it, but holding the main stem motionless. He seems to say, "I have a few more loose hairs about me, whenever you get ready to play with me again." Charlie says that Felix recognized him as soon as he came. I have little more to tell you about Charlie's visit; it was mainly going to the big tent. Charlie might tell you that two of my own compositions were sung by gifted singers to the audiences, and that I, myself, sang one of my songs to an immense crowd and reaped enthusiastic encores. But, alas! Charlie cannot get to speak to you, and as I am too modest to mention my own triumphs, and as there is nobody else to tell you, this is something you can never know. You will remember I wanted to give Charlie a trip to Missouri after leaving me, but we concluded it was too expensive; so we bought him a suit of clothes, a hat, collars, etc., instead. When he arrived he wore the same suit in which he had visited me last August; so I know you are glad he has his new clothes. He will leave here on the 19th to visit his sister Bessie, for the people who adopted her live in a town on the way back to St. Louis. After going to St. Louis, he will go to Dorsey, Ill.—round trip only $1.68. Here is what Mrs. N. C. Skinner of Dorsey writes: "I am glad I wrote for Charlie to come to Dorsey. One who used to preach for us while my father lived, saw my name in the Av. S. notes, and wrote me a beautiful letter. I hadn't heard from him directly in twenty years—J. B. Corwine. Three of my neighbors say they will take Charlie a week, so if you wish, that will make a month for him here." Isn't that splendid? So he will get his whole summer's outing, after all. While writing this (and being interrupted by company) Charlie went to the postoffice. And what do you think he got? Try to guess! But you never could! I wish you could see it! The prettiest little gold locket you ever saw with a blue ribbon through the gold ring, and the face of the locket adorned with an opal, an amethyst and two diamonds. The locket opens, of course, and within is a place for Charlie's picture. On the back of the locket is engraved the word "Felix." No letter came with this locket, but this was written on a sheet of paper: "For Bessie, from Charlie and Felix." You understand? The locket is given to Charlie that he may give it to his sister. Don't you know that that makes Charlie happier than if it were something for himself? When will people learn that happiness comes by giving it away? The reason the sun is bright is because it is giving away all its light all the time. Well, it looks like something sweet is always happening in this world. But that doesn't surprise us; isn't it God's world? Now about our ice cream social of August. Can't you give a little social of some kind where you live, and send the proceeds for Charlie's education, and all have their socials on or about August 3, or some other time? I have an idea, partly due to a letter just at hand from Mrs. Carrie P. Johnston, Stewartsville, Mo. I am going to write an invitation in poetry. Please cut it out of this page, and give it to a friend; and consider that you, in reading it, are specially mentioned:

You're invited by this poetic word
  To our Icecream Social, Aug. 3rd.
Ten cents or more be your donation
  To Orphan Charlie's education.
The icecream will not chill your blood,
  It's not expressed but understood.
Come (in the spirit) shine or rain,
  But send your money by the train.
You nothing get, save by love's law.
  At Bentonville, in Ark.

The new church Hymnal "Gloria in Excelsis," is par excellence the hymn book of the Christian church. It has no equal and it will be a long time before it has its superior. The church, choir, and preacher here are delighted with it. J. H. McNeil (minister) Kokomo, Ind.

Harold Bell Wright of Lebanon, Mo., under the direction of his official board, has placed the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in every home represented in his congregation. This arrangement in combination with such a minister as Bro. Wright, insures a glorious future for that fruitful church.

We certainly are taking our preachers and other readers into partnership and on most liberal terms in submitting to them the price list of our summer book bargains found in last week's issue and to reappear in the next. These are not defective copies or unsalable books, but are taken from our selected stock for the purpose of rewarding our patrons for their faithfulness and to prevent that "summer slump" that is the dread of so many publishing houses. Our helpers are employed and we purpose keeping them busy.

The accompanying picture is but one of many beautiful scenic features that will make delightful the trip to the Buffalo convention in October with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST special over the Wabash. This will be the most interesting convention since the Jubilee in 1900. Every Disciple who possibly can, should attend. Write us for particulars. Those wishing to earn transportation by selling the various publications of this House will write to the General Superintendent.

The growth of our subscription list is suffering no abatement. The general process is for a man to send us the name of his neighbor and $1.50. We are pleased to note some clubs, however. UNIVERSITY ADVANTAGES

Drake University, with its many colleges and special schools, affords rare privileges of varied courses of study to the Bible student. The Bible College courses present almost every branch of Biblical learning that Christian workers need, such as Exegesis, History of Missions, Hermeneutics. Old Testament History, New Testament History, and the like. The College of Liberal Arts is one of the strongest in the country. The Normal School and Academy are available to students of this school without extra charge for tuition, and offer the usual branches of preparatory work. The College of Music affords as fine musical training as can be found any place in the West, and this is supplemented by special instruction in church music. The Business College offers Stenography and Typewriting, or any other branch of business training that might seem desirable to pastors' assistants.

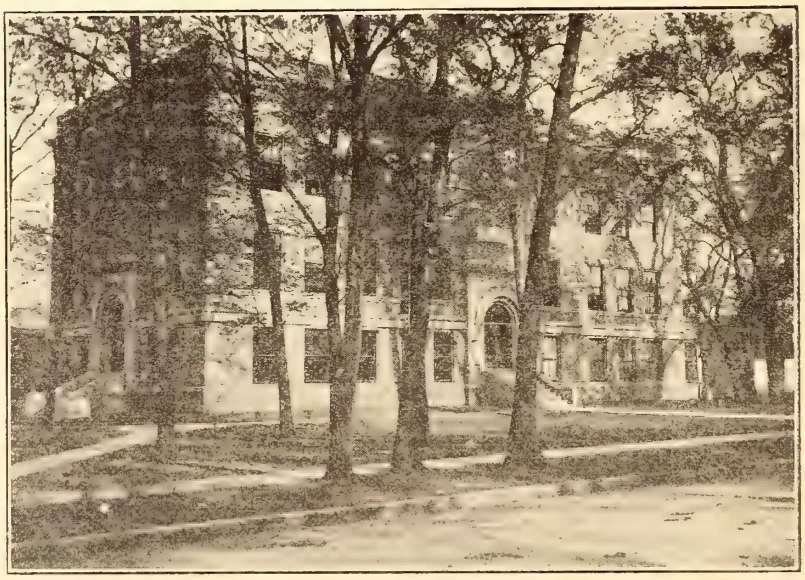
The many churches of Des Moines illustrate every phase of religious activity, and afford opportunities for practical work of every kind. A large number of charitable institutions, missions, rescue stations, social settlements and other enterprises of a similar character are located in and around Des Moines, and are accessible for the instruction of students in the Bible College.

SCOPE OF INSTRUCTION

By a combination of studies which have been taught in the University, and the addition of various courses directly suited to workers of every kind in the church, and especially in the cities and on mission fields, opportunities for special training are offered to the following classes of workers: (1) Preachers' wives, assistant ministers and others, whether men or women, who wish to be efficient promoters of local church work; (2) Christian women who wish to prepare for acceptable service in the churches as pastoral clerks and amanuenses; (3) Preachers who desire special practical training, sermonic, pastoral, or any other kind not leading to thorough theological scholarship; (4) Evangelistic singers, church choristers, sacred soloists, and church organists; (5) Teachers of Sunday schools, leaders of Endeavor societies, secretaries of Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, and organizers of religious societies of any kind.

The growth of this Bible College has been rapid from the first. There are reasons for this.

More than 800 ministers and missionaries in the field received their training in the Bible College of Drake University.



MEMORIAL HALL

Memorial Hall, especially constructed for the Bible College of Drake University, is in every way admirably arranged and equipped. This splendid structure contains twelve large recitation rooms, an assembly room, a well equipped dining room and kitchen, and numerous offices and cloak rooms.

Students are assisted in various ways:

1. Scholarships of the value of $50.00 each have been provided for a number of students.
2. A scholarship established for the benefit of young women preparing for the mission field has been provided.
3. The Phillips and other loan funds make it possible for worthy students to borrow the funds necessary to pay a part of their school expenses, the same to be returned after the student has completed his course and has a chance to earn enough to reimburse the loan fund.
4. Opportunities for young men to preach for churches near Des Moines are abundant and remunerative. Many earn their entire school expense in this way.
5. Those not yet prepared to preach find many opportunities to work and earn all, or a portion of their expense while in school.

Some things you will find out if you attend the Bible College;

1. Scholarly, broad-minded men on the faculty who have Christ for their creed.
2. A corps of instructors that know how to develop true men into successful preachers of the Word.
3. Thorough, practical courses of study arranged to help men to the acquirement of the fundamentals of religious truth.
4. An excellent library of books specially selected for the use of ministerial students.
5. Memorial Hall, the home of the Bible College, the best building on the campus of the University.
6. A splendidly equipped Bible College that challenges the admiration and secures the patronage of a great Brotherhood in this and other lands.
7. One of the most self-respecting, aggressive bands of students ever enrolled in any Bible College.
8. An institution whose graduates are filling many of the most important pulpits in this country, and whose trained missionaries may be found in every foreign field.
9. That the Bible College is but one of several prosperous colleges that constitute Drake University, viz: Liberal Arts, Bible, Law, Medical, Dental, Music, and Normal.
10. A Bible College that has sent a representative to the mission field for every year of its history.

The expenses are low—so low that no ambitious young man or woman should find it impossible to attend school here. The opportunities offered in Des Moines for students to work for a portion of their expenses are numerous and remunerative. Fully one-half earn a portion of their expenses while attending the University.

Drake University always has been and still is a school pre-eminently for the poor man or woman who is willing to work for an education.

We are anxious to correspond with every young man and woman in the Church of Christ that desires to prepare for the ministry or the mission field. It will be a great accommodation to us and to this paper if, when writing you will state that you read this advertisement in The Christian-Evangelist. We gladly answer correspondence and willingly send announcements of any of the various colleges of the University. Let us send to you our complete Bible College Announcement.

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
  Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
  The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
  For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
  Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
  And the song of victory.

1809 CENTENNIAL PROPAGANDA CHURCHES OF CHRIST 1909

: : : GEO. L. SNIVELY : : :

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

E. L. Powell's article, following, is a helpful contribution to the great Centennial propaganda. It is commended to the consideration of those delegates to the Buffalo convention who will attend the business sessions and help determine the policy of the churches toward the Pittsburg celebration. Admiring the paper as we do, we yet feel constrained to write "amplius" over the face of it. Fulfilling either of his suggestions would have been a creditable achievement for us fifty years ago but now if our hearts were all aflame with love for God and man and with zeal for the dissemination of the precious truth heaven has committed to us for the use of the world, we would build the memorial in Chicago, Boston or New York, fittingly endow old Bethany, and after placing these gifts on the altar, have remaining sufficient resources and vitality to write the names of 2,000,000 Disciples on the rosters of Churches of Christ before 1909. All vagueness should cease after our next convention or we shall not accomplish so much as one memorial church or endowment. Space will be given in this department or People's Forum for the discussion of Brother Powell's suggestions. We urge earnest attention to these contributions and trust that they will help our leaders to definiteness of purpose and ultimately to achievements that will make our Centennial a great blessing to all mankind.

The New Education Society; Its Plans and Aims.

BY C. C. ROWLISON.

At the Indianapolis congress in April the National Christian Education Society was reorganized by constituting the executive heads of our various educational institutions the directors of the society. A meeting of the new directors who were at the congress was held immediately, and it was decided to begin at once plans for properly representing our educational institutions at Buffalo next October, and also to interest the whole brotherhood in the observance of education day the third Sunday in January.

The purpose of the organization under the new form is to put the colleges and other educational institutions behind the movement and to hold them responsible for results. It is believed that this is the natural way for our educational interests to organize themselves, and several excellent results ought to follow.

First, our colleges ought to come, by this means, into co-operation. They exist for the brotherhood, and not the brotherhood for the colleges. That all should come to frankly recognize this and heartily co-operate to secure the best results for our people, seems self evident.

Second, the colleges working thus together, with the help of other agencies, ought to create a much greater interest in education than has heretofore been manifested among our people.

In order to meet the demands of present necessities, the membership fee has been placed at $2.00 a year, and it is hoped a large number of friends of this movement will send contributions at once to Pres. R. E. Hieronymous of Eureka, the secretary-treasurer of the new organization.

Our colleges and all our educational institutions must join in a united effort to make our centennial celebration a worthy one. To educate our ministry, and to educate our young people for active Christian service whether they are ministers or not, is the object of our colleges. If there have been failures in the past, it has been largely due to the fact that our people have refused to properly equip our educational institutions. If there are to be large results in the future of any of the great movements of the church, it will be due chiefly to the fact that our people have realized the needs of our colleges and have supplied them.

Hiram, O.

Centennial Aims.

BY E. L. POWELL.

In thinking of a proper observance of our Centennial as a religious movement, I am persuaded that to concentrate on some one definite enterprise and to achieve it will be far more significant than to attempt a dozen or a hundred things—none of which will be conspicuous or commanding, and few of which will be brought to a successful consummation. Is there not some one thing upon which we can unite our brotherhood and which shall be possible of accomplishment before our great Pittsburg gathering? It ought to be something that shall stand forth in the coming years as a monument specifically speaking of the first hundred years of our history. In order that such a thing shall become practicable, it would be necessary in the first place for our religious journals (I mean, of course, our own) to agree together concerning the thing to be attempted and which they would agree to press continuously and enthusiastically. Would this be possible? Then, of course, the enterprise agreed upon should be brought before our churches throughout the country by means of agents appointed to that work and through the preachers of the churches. If the enterprise has in it elements of enthusiasm—one that shall appeal to the heart, the imagination and the loyalty of our people—I believe the churches could be reached successfully and the needed money could be secured. What should the enterprise be? I have thought of several, any one of which would be definite and worthy of our united support and enthusiastic endorsement. 1. Build a great church in Boston or New York or Chicago. We can never accomplish great things in these cities unless we shall have adequate equipment. The Christian Science temple recently dedicated in Boston at once effected an entrance for that society into the thought and consciousness of Boston. In a great city we must in some way let the people know that we are on the ground. A splendid church edifice, dedicated to the restoration of the simple Christianity of Christ and his apostles, located advantageously in some one of these great cities, standing as a centennial monument of a great brotherhood, would be known at least as standing for the faith of a people who meant to have a worthy platform for the advocacy of a great idea. I believe that such a noble and commanding structure in New York or Boston would in a very short while have a membership in its walls which would more than justify our expenditure of money. Such an enterprise as this should be taken under the management of our American Christian Missionary Society. 2. Or, again, why not attempt to unite our brotherhood in the effort to worthily endow Bethany College as the mother college among us and let that be our specific centennial monument? There would be eminent fitness in such an undertaking. Could we not start a wave of enthusiasm in such a cause? We could all unite on Bethany, while there might be difficulty in securing a united sentiment in behalf of any other institution among us. 3. I will not name another enterprise. Suffice it to say, that my contention is that some one definite, specific enterprise should stand forth, from all the general work we hope to do, to be known as our recognition of this centenary anniversary. Could we agree at Buffalo upon some notable undertaking—separate from anything we are now doing or attempting—a clean-cut, one-idea centennial—a monument that shall stand for long years in the coming time as the recognition of a great people of their noble inheritance? Would not a crusade just at this time be a saving ministry—saving us at least from vagueness and indefiniteness?

Centennial Propagandists.

I thank God for the Christian-Evangelist. It is the expression of our hopes for any great and abiding future.

Bruce Brown, Minister.

I am enjoying the Christian-Evangelist as I have for a number of years, and congratulate you upon the high tone and character it maintains. Federation is going to win, just the same, and Disciples are going to be in it. Indeed, I have the confidence that more of them are in it now, and we will stay, always hoping for the end of which federation is one of the means.

P. J. Rice, Minister.

Current Events

The Fall of the Douma.

The Czar's ukase dissolving the Russian parliament marks the culmination of a constant and increasing friction between this new legislative body and the old bureaucracy and autocracy which is still spoken of as "the government." The Douma precipitated the crisis by issuing an address to the country on the agrarian question, which the government forbade the newspapers to publish, and passing a resolution of lack of confidence in the ministry and calling for its resignation. The Czar, in his edict, expresses the high hopes which he had at the convocation of the Douma and his disappointment at its performance. "The representatives of the nation, instead of applying themselves to the work of productive legislation, strayed into a field beyond their competence, and have been making comments on the imperfections of the fundamental laws, which can only be modified by our imperial will." The autocratic idea is still too strong to permit comments on its imperfections. The Czar will find that the dissolution of parliament is easier than the solution of the problems now confronting him. Many members of the Douma fled across the border to Viborg, Finland, where they held a session and adopted a protest against the dissolution. This assembly was broken up by a threat of force. The Czar asserts that the acts of the Douma had encouraged disorder throughout the country. This may be true, but its adjournment under these circumstances is a much greater incentive to revolutionary uprisings. Only severe repressive measures can maintain a superficial appearance of internal quiet. St. Petersburg is under martial law and almost anything can be expected. Another election will be held and the new Douma will meet on March 5, 1907.

There have been few careers of stranger contrasts than that of Lady Curzon who died last week at her home in England. The daughter of a Chicago merchant, Levi Leiter, she married a young English nobleman of small fortune who later became Viceroy of India. To live in more than regal magnificance as virtually the empress over three hundred million orientals, does not usually fall within the experience of a Chicago tradesman's daughter.

Russell Sage.

The death of Russell Sage at the age of ninety years is something of a surprise. It did not seem likely that he would ever die—at least not so long as there was anyone left who wanted to borrow money at good interest on gilt-edged security. As an apostle of thrift and economy, Mr. Sage has perhaps never had an equal. He came very near to putting into practice the familiar directions for getting rich: "Work hard, make all the money you can and never spend a cent." In early life he was interested in politics and served two terms in Congress. Later all other interests were swallowed up in the joy of making money. Perhaps it was habit as much as greed which kept him at it to his ninetieth year, for he was a very methodical man. He early developed the habits of making much, spending little and giving none, and to these habits he adhered as rigidly as any clerk adheres to the habits which necessity forces upon him. He collected money as others collect rare postage stamps, or Chinese pottery, or Egyptian scarabs—because the collecting gave him pleasure and because he had nothing else to do.

The railroads charge shippers a dollar a day demurrage for every car that is not loaded or unloaded within 48 hours after its delivery. Why should not the railroads pay an equal sum for delay in furnishing cars? Certain Indiana manufacturers are arguing before the state railroad commission for the adoption of such a rule.

Japan's Experiment.

Japan is contemplating the nationalization of all her industries, according to a report received by the Bureau of Manufactures. This means the ibggest experiment in government ownership that has ever been attempted. The first step will be the taking over of the railroads. This in itself is no novelty. Several European governments operate part or all of their railroads and they are not in all cases the most progressive countries which do so. Russia, for example, has government railroads. But Japan's experiment will be much farther reaching and will be conducted under circumstances which will give it great value either as an example or as a warning to the rest of the world. The scheme, if it succeeds, will be an approach to a working socialism. But it does not follow that the result will be that at which the socialists aim. It may be the very opposite. If the government controls the industries, and a small clique controls the government, the last state will be worse than the first.

A brilliant and highly educated physician in Colorado, who for nine years has made a deep study of criminology, has been convicted of forgery. He says that he is a "natural criminal" and that for men so constituted crime is a constitutional necessity. In so far as this theory of crime is true, perhaps it is only a re-statement of the very old doctrine that the "natural man" needs reinforcement and regeneration from a higher source to conquer his downward tendencies.

The Truly Great.

Pennsylvania has chosen a queer group of men to immortalize on the bronze doors of the new state capitol. There are, among others, the features of Quay, Penrose, Pennypacker, Durham and Senator Clark of Montana—all in imperishable bronze to represent the ideals of Pennsylvania statesmanship and citizenship. Benjamin Franklin may think himself lucky not to have been included in this assembly of notables. William Penn would seem, to the average mind, to have had some claim to a place, but he would doubtless gladly waive it, considering the company. And there are those (not members of the late Pennsylvania capitol commission, of course), who might have chosen Robert Morris as a more suitable example for the young than Senator Clark of Montana, who happened to be born in Pennsylvania. The state has long been cursed with unclean politics. But for it not only to tolerate but, in a sense, to canonize the men most guiltily responsible for ring rule and machine domination, is an unspeakable depth of degradation. There are intimations that the new commission will make some alterations in the doors and save the state from the disgrace of publicly proclaiming these men as the ones whom it delights to honor in its hall of heroes.

Alfred Beit.

Alfred Beit, who with Cecil Rhodes and Barney Barnato constituted the great trio of South African financiers, is dead, leaving an estate estimated at from $50,000,000 to more than twice that amount. The will includes liberal bequests for education, especially in South Africa. An extraordinary feature of the will is a bequest of $6,000,000 to be used in building railways, telegraph and telephone lines in South Africa. This he considered a charitable enterprise since it is difficult to raise money for these most necessary instruments of civilization. It is rather remarkable that two out of these three bonanza kings should leave the bulk of their estates for educational purposes. Beit was the silent and unspectacular member of the trio. He was not a plunging speculator like Barnato, nor did he venture into the political aspects of high finance as daringly as Rhodes. But it was he who effected the consolidation of the diamond mines of South Africa and created the perpetual corner on their product in order to prevent the fall in their price through the increase of production.

A Correction.

Professor Clark, of Drake university, calls attention to a historical inaccuracy in our recent paragraph on the Rio Janeiro conference. We stated that the Panama conference of 1826 was attended by Henry Clay, whereas it seems that neither Mr. Clay nor anyone else represented the United States on that occasion. The writer of Current Events happened to be a long way from his reference books when the paragraph was written and at the time of receiving this correction he is still without facilities for consulting the authorities. So, as the original statement was made on memory the correction is accepted on faith. Professor Clark's interesting letter will be found on another page.

Bids were opened last week for the $30,000,000 Panama canal bonds. The whole issue was subscribed at an average price a shade under 104. The bonds draw two per cent interest and are available for national banks as a basis for the issue of bank notes. The bond sale will therefore mean an increase in currency.

Congregationalists or Individualists—Which?

Following up some of the thoughts in our last week's editorial we raise the above inquiry. We have reached a stage in the development of our organic life as a religious movement when this question seems to us very pertinent. We have been accustomed to say of our form of church government that we are congregationalists; that is, we believe in and practice the autonomy and independence of the local church which is the real unit in the associational life of the Church as a whole. The Baptists, the Congregationalists, and the Disciples of Christ, or Christian churches, are the best representatives of this form of government. The theory of congregationalism does not exclude the fellowship and co-operation of sister churches in the furtherance of common interests.

Let us suppose two local congregations holding essentially the same faith, doctrines and worship. Each is adequate to the carrying on of its own life and work; but a neighboring city has no church and needs one. Neither of the two churches, alone, is able to undertake this enterprise, but jointly they agree to establish a church at this point. The churches still remain free and autonomous as relates to their own local work, but in this common work they co-operate, and each has its voice in the management. Of course, when the number of churches co-operating becomes great, a wise economy requires that certain persons representing all the churches be designated to collect and disburse the funds and have direct supervision of the mission work. This, in a nutshell, is the theory and method of missionary organization.

This has been the theory rather than the practice among the Disciples of Christ in their missionary work. In practice the individual rather than the congregation has become the unit in our organized missionary work. This came about in a natural way. At first there were many congregations opposed to co-operative missionary work through missionary organizations. Local churches, as such, therefore, did not enter into this kind of co-operation, but individual members exercised their right in so doing. This made it necessary in the beginning to establish what was known as life memberships and life directorships, in which individual Christians entered into co-operation for the spread of the Gospel. While this feature of the work has well nigh dropped out of sight, and local churches with their Sunday-schools, are contributing very largely the funds for missionary work, the theory of individual representation in conventions yet prevails, and the local church is practically lost sight of, so far as having a voice through our conventions in the management and policy of our missionary work. We do not hear anything more now about delegates from the churches, or from state conventions which are supposed to represent groups of churches, but our national conventions, as well as our state conventions, are simply mass meetings of individual members.

While this was probably inevitable under the conditions which prevailed in the past, and while great good has been accomplished in the development of the missionary spirit and in the unification of our membership throughout the country by these mass meetings, has not the time come when our conventions, both state and national, should be based on the idea of representatives from the congregations or local churches? In other words, if we believe in the free, democratic management of the affairs of the church by the churches themselves, instead of by a hierarchy, or by editors or secretaries, ought we not to establish representative conventions which shall voice the sentiment of the brotherhood on the great moral and religious movements of the times? If it be objected that this might lead to an oppressive form of ecclesiasticism, our reply is, that it would be a strange phenomenon in religious history if the local churches, acting through their own chosen representatives, should bind upon themselves a galling and oppressive yoke of tyranny! We may trust the churches to take care of their freedom when they have a voice in the councils of the brotherhood.

If, then, the congregational idea rather than the individualistic idea, is the ideal we have set before us, we ought at once to set about realizing it through a representative gathering in which the local churches are fairly represented. There are great questions, and they are constantly growing greater with our growth—relating to policies and measures in connection with our missionary, educational and benevolent work, and our relation to other Christian bodies, which are seeking the same great ends that we are seeking to accomplish, which require the deliberation and considerate action of a great representative body made up of chosen delegates, acting under parliamentary rules and under the higher motive of Christian love and fellowship. We owe it to ourselves, and to the great cause we represent, to establish as speedily as possible, such a representative body for the transaction of the Master's business, in connection with the on-going of his kingdom.

This, as we have said, has been our theory from the beginning. It is incorporated in the constitution and by-laws which are supposed to govern the convention of the American Christian Missionary Society, but which, as a matter of fact, have, in this respect, become a dead letter. No constitutional changes would be required to realize the kind of convention we are pleading for. It simply requires carrying out, in an orderly and systematic way, the provision of the constitution relating to representation, as it now exists. We can no longer plead youthfulness, immaturity, and inexperience as excuses for the unmethodical way in which we have been carrying on the Lord's business. We are old enough, large enough, experienced enough, and have wisdom enough, we are sure, to have respect to the apostolic admonition, "Let all things be done decently and in order." Nothing would be more timely, just now, than a circular letter from our Home Mission Board to the various state boards, calling attention to this provision of the constitution, and urging compliance therewith in the selection of delegates to the Buffalo convention, either through the state conventions, or by the boards themselves in cases where the conventions have been held and no such action taken. If it shall be found that any modifications are demanded by changed conditions, let such modifications be made as early as possible. We trust our Home Board will take the initiative in bringing about this needed reform.

Temples of God.

Every people in every age and in every land have had their sacred places dedicated to the worship of the Supreme Being. That of the Jews at Jerusalem was, perhaps, the most splendid and certainly the most celebrated of all the temples where God's presence was supposed to dwell. But God dwells not in temples made with hands. Even the heaven of heavens can not contain him. He dwells in the humble and contrite heart, forgiven and purified from sin.

In his letter to the church at Corinth the Apostle Paul says: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" Here the local church is designated as a temple of God. The church was acting, in some respects, as if it were ignorant of this fact. The divisions that were growing up in it were the outgrowth of carnality, and not of the Holy Spirit. The thought of the apostle evidently is, that, as the temple in Jerusalem was the seat and center of the invisible manifestation of God, so each local church, as well as each individual member, is a place where God's presence is to be so manifested that the world may know that God is present with his people molding their character, shaping their policies, and controlling their lives.

Does the average local church realize its responsibility in making manifest the presence of God to the community in which it exists? Does it not need some one to remind it, as Paul did the Corinthians, that it is a temple of God indwelt by the Spirit of God, and that if any man defile the temple of God him will God destroy? Local churches are greatly concerned about their buildings, their location, their material equipment, and these are by no means unimportant, but they are subordinate to the chief thing, which is the manifestation of the life of God in the community. The world is judging the church to-day not by the kind of houses it worships in, nor by the music it furnishes, nor yet by its creed or ritual, but by the kind of character it produces in its members and by its collective life and influence in the community.

Is it asked how the local church may show that it is a temple of God? The answer is very plain. God is holy, and his temple must be holy. The church that would manifest God's presence must put away all evil practices, all selfish and sectarian aims and ambitions, and seek only the glory of God and the good of men. The life of Jesus Christ which is the supreme manifestation of God in history, must be manifest in the lives of such a church. All worldliness of spirit, sordidness of aim, and covetousness, which is idolatry, must be put away by the church that would be a temple of God—a fit dwelling place for the Holy Spirit.

Again the local church that would be a temple of God must be a united church. It was the spirit of strife and division in the Corinthian church that caused Paul to remind it that such a course was inconsistent with the very purpose of the church which was to be a temple of God. The people instinctively know that a church marked by strife and contention is not a temple of God. Such a course grieves away the Spirit of God. A united church whose members love each other and bear each other's burdens, which is united in its councils, working together harmoniously gives a strong evidence that it is indeed a temple of God. Not only will a church in which God's Spirit dwells be united among its own members, but it will be ready to co-operate in every good work with every church seeking to accomplish the same end.

Another way in which the local church may show that God dwells in it by his Spirit and that it is, therefore, a temple of God is that it is doing the work of God in the community and in the world. Such a church puts itself into harmony with the great purposes of God in the evangelization of the world and in ministering to the manifold needs of man. No church that is satisfied with caring for its own local interests and that has no care for the great world lying in sin and ignorance, can justly claim to be a temple of God. Christ's vision was world-wide and the church in which his Spirit dwells will see the world's needs through his eyes and feel its suffering with his heart.

The only true and worthy aim of the local church is to make itself worthy to be a temple of God, the dwelling place of his Spirit, and a center of holy influence and religious activity which have for their aim and end the redemption of the world. No church, perhaps, can attain to that ideal in a perfect degree; all can approximate it. Paul, writing to the Ephesians, said: "In whom each several building fitly framed together groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God in the Spirit." It is only by growth in the direction indicated that "each several building," or each local church, can become, in the full sense, "a habitation of God in the Spirit."

Notes and Comments.

Our Baptist brethren know a good thing, when vouched for by this paper, and we are glad to see them recommend it to the brotherhood.

> The Disciples are discussing having a department of evangelism in each of their denominational colleges. A Mr. Wm. J. Wright, their national superintendent of evangelism, closes an able article on "Our Colleges and Evangelism" in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, with these words: "Let this be the program in our colleges; make our young preachers evangelistic. Our national board of evangelism, in order to bring this to pass, extends herein to all our colleges a helping hand. The evangelistic institutes and schools of evangelism which we conduct will give your students new ideas of the ministry, and will influence their preaching for many years." We are sure the home board at Atlanta could use our seminary wisely and well for evangelistic work even as does our Nashville board for Sunday-school work.—Baptist Argus.

In another place will be found an address by Bro. E. S. Muckley of Portland, Oregon, delivered before the State Ministerial association at the Oregon State convention at Turner, June 22d, on "The present status of the union question and our attitude toward it." Our readers will not fail to see its harmony with the position advocated by the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is gratifying that the convention in Oregon requested, by unanimous vote, the publication of this address. We pointed out, recently, what we thought was an illogical inference in a resolution which they passed, but their endorsement of this address shows that their heads and hearts are pointing in the right direction. Referring to the subject of federation, the address says: "I say federate, if we can secure a basis of federation that will not morally bind us to stay out of any community where we feel we ought to preach the gospel." So far as heard from not a man among us favors any other kind of federation. The phrase "as far as possible," in the proposed basis, is intended to cover exactly that point. It ought to be self-evident that no method of co-operation is practicable, to-day, that does not allow that liberty. When the time comes, as we believe it will come, when the gospel will be preached and practiced substantially alike—that is, in all its fundamental doctrines and ordinances—then we may talk about a division of territory, but the best that can be done at present is that this question of overlapping and unnecessary multiplication of churches be made the subject of fraternal conference, leaving the ultimate decision to each co-operating body as to what action it shall take. We have not believed, and do not believe yet, that there is any serious disagreement among the Disciples of Christ on this subject, if we could ever get a fair statement of what we mean by federation before the brethren. We bespeak a careful reading of Brother Muckley's address.

Current Religious Thought.

The following from the "Interior" may not ring just orthodox according to Calvinistic standards, but its truthfulness is very apparent:

> "There is enough wickedness in every man to make a demon out of him, if Satan can get the job. There is a possibility in every man of making a saint out of him, if he puts himself in the hands of Christ. We are transformed into the image of the one we serve. It is not so much a question what faculties we possess as it is what we are going to make out of them. It is not so much a question where we are as the direction we are traveling."

In the following extract from an address delivered by Pres. E. Y. Mullins of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville before the Baptist Educational Society of Kentucky, recently, we find some things which we think will be of interest and of profit to our readers. Baptists and Disciples are not only alike in many of their strong points but, also, in many of their weaknesses, as the following extract will indicate:

> In Kentucky one of our chief denominational difficulties is, as is so often the case, the exaggeration and abuse of a good thing. It is abnormal doctrinal sensitiveness. The skin of the human body ought to be sensitive up to a certain point. Nature so intended it. But when diseased and inflamed, it may become so sensitive that the alighting of a fly upon it will cause excruciating agony. It becomes abnormally sensitive. It is diseased.
> Now I yield to none in my advocacy of sound doctrine, but I am very certain that it is possible for abnormal sensitiveness on the subject to defeat its own ends and open the door to all kinds of heresies. I am ready to prove this from history if necessary.
> A does not agree with B on the doctrine of the universal church. This means conversely that B does not agree with A. C does not agree with D on alien immersion, i. e., D does not agree with C. One brother thinks he can trace a succession of Baptist churches back to the apostles; another finds that he can not so trace it. One brother opposes inviting any other than a Baptist into a Baptist pulpit or to the platform of a Baptist school; another does not oppose. Kentucky was once riven on the subject of a strange proceeding, a question of ordination, and missions were sidetracked for a year or two. At another time we had a long controversy over a plan for raising money, and from time to time one or another of the above subjects has been the storm center. Then we have had controversies between Boardites and Anti-boardites, as if any man could coerce any Baptist to work through a board if he chooses not to, or on the contrary as if any Baptist could prevent any other from working with boards if he sees fit. So of healing without medicine and by faith alone. And lastly came 1641 and the deluge.
> Now what I maintain is that all these are questions upon which Baptists differ and will continue to differ doubtless for some time to come. They are questions, moreover, on which they have a right to differ so long as they understand the Scriptures differently on these subjects.
> I am not here expressing any opinion regarding any of the above issues. If I were to do so I would be doing the very thing which I think here and now is uncalled for. What I maintain is that there is room within the limits of Baptist orthodoxy for much difference of opinion on subordinate matters. I maintain that I have no right to refuse to call a Baptist my brother merely because he does not happen to be a twin brother, and I also maintain that another Baptist has no right to refuse to call me brother and nag and torment me because I am not his twin. I can love him and co-operate with him and do all I can to advance the kingdom with him, provided only he will let me.

PENTWATER MUSINGS.

We have come again to the most august month of the year. August with her golden days and her calm, clear, starlit nights, sits queenlike on her summer throne, while around her lie in abundance the harvests of sun and soil. It is high noon of the summer season, and one begins to look wistfully back over the summer that is rapidly going, and hopefully forward to the autumn that is coming. How swiftly the summers fly away into the irrevocable past! And what a golden chain of memories they make connecting the past with the present!

> "Far away where the summers are sleeping > Lie the beautiful dreams of the past."

True, but, thank God, the present has its dreams too, and they are no less beautiful than those of the summers of the long ago. But they are different. The lights and shadows blend differently from what they did in the earlier dreams, and the scene of their realization lies farther on. But, after all, it is not a question of how rapidly the summers go and the seasons revolve, as it is of what we are doing with life and what we are making out of it. The poet is right:

> "We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breath;
> In feelings, not in figures on the dial.
> We should count time by heart-throbs when they beat
> For God, for man, for duty. He most lives,
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.
> Life is but a means unto an end—that end,
> Beginning, mean, and end to all things, God."

To-day thick clouds mantle the sky and cast a somber shadow over land and lake. The trees stand in solemn stillness, as if they were holding out their leaves for the expected rain. Such days have a beauty and charm of their own. It is not good to always have the glare of the bright sunshine. There is a quietness in the woods, in these still, quiet days, and the very trees seem to be at worship. Nature is in a reverent mood, and the lover of nature soon enters into sympathy with this spirit. Part of the beauty of such a day, it is true, comes from the fact that it is not continuous. As we gaze yonder into the gray sky we know that beyond the clouds the sun is shining, and that very soon it will drive the mists away or send them down in refreshing showers, and the earth will once more bask in his radiance. There are some souls whose lives are always cloud-shadowed. This is not normal nor healthy. Better sing with James Whitcomb Riley:

> "O, heart of mine, we shouldn't
> Worry so.
> What we've missed of calm we couldn't
> Have, you know!
> What we've met of stormy pain
> And of sorrow's driving rain,
> We can better meet again
> If it blow.
> For we know, not every morrow
> Can be sad;
> So, forgetting all the sorrow
> We have had,
> Let us fold away our fears,
> And put by our foolish tears,
> And through all the coming years
> Just be glad."

The soul, however, that can "just be glad" all the days must send its roots down into deeper sources of happiness than earthly sunshine or shadow or any material condition of life. On the stormiest day that blows when great waves are rolling over the surface of the lake there is down beneath the tumult of waves a deep calm, undisturbed by the storm that rages above it. So, down in the depths of the human heart, there should lie evermore a calm, untroubled peace, undisturbed by the changing fortunes of this mortal life. This is what faith can do for us, when it is triumphant over doubts and fears.

We are receiving many inquiries from friends in different sections of the country about this park, and they are coming from a class of people that we would like to see here. They ask, among other questions, if it is our purpose to maintain the present quiet and restful character of the place, or whether there is danger of it becoming the scene of popular excursions and crowds of pleasure-seekers. There is no danger whatever from these latter disturbances, as our location insures us freedom from such crowds. There is plenty of room here, however, for a summer colony of several hundred people who without crowding each other in the least, may form a congenial society and yet maintain all the exclusion and quietness needful for complete rest. We are asked, again, if we have native woods here. That is exactly what we do have, and in great variety. The window from which we look, as we write these lines, presents a view of a primeval forest. There are enough of the larger and older trees to give dignity to the scene, while the large majority are the younger growth whose best days are yet to come. These woods if cared for will be much finer a quarter of a century hence than they are to-day. Some writers have the idea that we are living a sort of hermit life here, far removed from the haunts of civilization! This is because we have spoken of "The Pioneer," as the only cottage in "Garrison Park." But "Garrison Park" is joined hard by on the north with Oceana Beach, a settlement of choice people who are seeking there exactly what we are seeking here, and their club house is connected with "The Pioneer" cottage by a plank walk running along the hillside, five minutes distant, and this again joins onto Pentwater village with a little lake intervening, only a few minutes distant. So we are not out of touch with our fellow men. We can live all day in the woods alone, if we wish to, or we can meet our friends at the club house for a social time when we desire to do that. At the present time the club house is well nigh filled with St. Louis people.

It is difficult to convey an accurate mental picture of this place to one who has not been here and who is unacquainted with the peculiar formation of land along the east shore of Lake Michigan. During the past centuries and millenniums the wind and the waves have thrown up vast bulwarks of sand to mark the eastern boundaries of the lake saying to this great, unsalted sea:

> "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther,
> And here shall thy proud waves be stayed."

On these sand dunes thus reared by the forces of nature have been sown the seeds of a great variety of trees and these grow luxuriantly and have cast their foliage on the sand through so many generations that a surface soil has been formed in many places concealing the sand. Down through this range of sand hills, thus forest-mantled, run winding ravines, some of which come through to the lake, but more of them have been obstructed at the mouth by these sand-dunes and have no outlet to the lake. This is the formation at Pentwater, along the beach at "Garrison Park." On the summit of these hills commanding wide ranges of the lake or along the edges of the ravines, or on smaller ridges farther back with glimpses of the lake through the trees, cottages are built and more are to be built, forming ideal summer homes for those who would escape the heat and noise of the cities for the coolness and quiet of the woods and the lake. In a level space between two of these higher sand dunes with a lofty ridge in the rear, and a grove of hemlocks in front of it between it and the lake the "Pioneer" cottage is located, with woods to the right of it, woods to the left of it, woods to the rear of it, and the lake in front of it—another "Edgewood-on-the-Lake," but with more elbow room. We shall present our readers a picture of it soon which will give them a better idea than any verbal description we can give.

Our readers have, no doubt, been much interested as we have been, in watching the outcome of the meeting held in Park Theater, Manchester, New Hampshire, by our Brother Herbert Yeuell. Whatever may be the immediate outcome of that meeting, we predict that it is the forerunner of a church not only in Manchester but in many another New England city, built after the pattern furnished us in the New Testament. The meeting has served to emphasize, as nothing else could have done, the need of an aggressive, evangelistic campaign in the New England cities by the Disciples of Christ. The amount of ignorance and misinformation concerning the Spirit, teaching, and aim of this Reformation which Brother Yeuell has had to contend with in the heart of New England, is a challenge to our whole brotherhood to show these people of the east who we are and what are here for. Of course this should be done in a broad unsectarian way and with the sole motive of advancing the kingdom of God. We have some things to teach our friends in the east, and they, doubtless, have some things which we can learn from them with profit. We believe, therefore, in a campaign that shall be both aggressive and fraternal. This meeting emphasizes, also, what we had learned before; that progress in the east must be made by quiet and persistent effort, time being an essential factor in the success of the work. These hard-headed Yankees do not move as rapidly nor as easily as the people of the south and west; but the plea for a united church by a return to Christ and his simple gospel, and the clear, straightforward evangelistic methods of the New Testament—this is bound to prevail ultimately in every section of our land and in all lands. Oh, that we might worthily preach it, live it, and illustrate it in our church life!

Some of My Likings---4. Why I Like the Disciples of Christ

By WILLIAM DURBAN

The late beloved Hugh Price Hughes, the popular English Methodist leader of our times, not long before his death expressed the opinion that the progress of the Disciples of Christ in the United States was "the most amazing religious phenomenon of the age." He at the same time said that he wondered whether they could possibly live up to their beautiful name. The Disciples of Christ in America have many great advantages beside "the beautiful name whereby they are called." They constitute the only great body of Christians which had its origin on American soil. Therefore they must always sustain a peculiar claim on the people of the great republic. But this nationalist advantage places them at something of a disadvantage when they enthusiastically seek to claim the sympathy for their views from people of other lands. Their plea is apt to be regarded as something American rather than cosmopolitan. In reality it is the latter.

Of No Nationality.

F. W. Robertson, of Brighton, said that "Jesus Christ was of no nationality." I like the Disciples because they are in their principles of no nationality, notwithstanding that the magnificent movement which they represent had its genesis in America. They stand for Christianity in its perfect adaptation to humanity without respect to geographical or racial limitations. This explains the remarkable growth in a few years of their foreign missionary society. I have carefully examined the comparative statistics of the great foreign missions, and I find that the work of the Disciples of Christ in this direction is greater than that of any other religious body, in proportion to age. No other organization has shown such a ratio of missionary increase, in resources, in staff, in results. Other societies started far earlier and had greater numbers at their back when the Disciples of Christ had not yet sprung into existence. Indeed, other great Christian communions were commencing their foreign field organization at about the period when these modern Disciples of Christ were about to be heard of for the first time. The rapid success of the Disciples as soon as they were able to launch forth on missionary enterprise amongst various nations is in itself a proof of the universal adaptability of their plea. The Disciple movement as a missionary agency will in the days to come astonish the Disciples themselves. And it will astonish the world.

Good Congregationalists.

I love the Disciples of Christ because they are such excellent congregationalists. Perhaps it is because I was cradled and trained under the auspices of Anglicanism in the old country that therefore I am attached to the congregational form of ecclesiastical polity, by way of reaction from the prelatic exclusiveness of the Church of England. It is perfectly true that in some quarters Congregationalism has long since run to seed and that Congregationalists themselves often admit that they have tended to make of their system a rope of sand. But the principle of polity is soundly scriptural and is in accord with the noblest instincts of the human mind in its love of liberty of conscience, its passion for the assertion of individualism, and its correlative tendency, at the same time, to a spiritual fellowship of all, which is the genesis of true socialism. I have never seen a Church of Disciples of Christ come into being which did not quickly display a desire for co-operation with other churches. Our Churches of Christ in England are all very youthful. I saw them all spring up as the results of efforts on the part of American missionaries (whom may God bless and multiply!) And it has been my delight to mark how, while each of these young churches has enjoyed fullest independence, it has welcomed the affiliating fellowship of its sister communions already established with alacrity. Thus, when only four of the infant interests had come into being, twenty years ago, these formed themselves into a fraternal—or sororal—co-operation, whichever we may call it.

Good Baptists.

I like the Disciples of Christ because they are excellent baptists. As they are not congregationalists in any sectarian sense, but simply according to the style of the apostolic churches, so they are not sectarian Baptists, but are immersionists because the consensus of Christendom admits the apostolicity of immersion, and because the scholarship of the world endorses the interpretation of Hellenist terms on which immersion is founded. I long since came to understand that on points where Congregationalists and Anglicans differ, the former are right and the latter are wrong; on all points where Congregationalists and Baptists differ, the latter are right, and the former are wrong; on all points where Baptists differ from Disciples, the Baptists are wrong, the Disciples right. It may be that we also at some point or other are in the wrong. If so, then we will find in time that those will be raised up who can set us right.

In Relation to Communion.

I like the position of the Disciples with regard to fellowship and membership. The generally accepted rule is that which C. H. Spurgeon as a Baptist so strenuously advocated and so consistently practiced. Many of his brethren in his own denomination stoutly contended against him, and the Baptists in Britain are to-day deeply divided on this communion controversy. Of late years the practice of open membership, without respect to baptism, has spread extensively, and very large numbers of so-called Baptist churches are union churches, though on no account would they accept any minister as pastor excepting a Baptist. He must be an immersionist, but the officers and members generally may be pedobaptists to any extent. There are now many Baptist churches in the United Kingdom which are only nominally so. It may be alleged that this system is indicative of the love of Christian unity. Doubtless the motive is right. The spirit is good. But there is something else to be considered. I have found during long observation that our Congregationalist brethren, who have fought heroic battles for freedom of conscience and for truth and righteousness, as well as our splendid Methodist brethren, are by no means pleased with these union churches. They consider that the Baptist churches which definitely call themselves such, and yet fling aside their principles to a sufficient extent to enable them to capture Congregationalists and Methodists and Presbyterians and Episcopalians as members are taking unfair advantage. There is justice in the complaint. On the other hand the strict communion churches, which deny the fellowship in the Lord's Supper to all who have not been immersed, are steadily perishing throughout the United Kingdom. The method which works most happily is that which practices close membership with open communion.

Declarations of Faith.

I like the Disciples of Christ because they fearlessly leave the truth to the care of divine providence and refuse to construct a lot of petty shanty little forts round the Gibraltar rock of Christ's own creed. There is a creed; Jesus himself committed it to his apostles; the church needs no other. It is massive, simple, sublime, impregnable. It is embodied in the immortal formula that "Jesus the Christ is the son of the living God." It is inscribed in Matt. 16:16. That is the creed of the disciples of Christ. It is my creed; because I am a disciple of Christ. It enables me to rejoice in sympathy with Christians of all evangelical bodies alike, instead of limiting my predilections preferentially. I have wandered in the streets of Augsburg, and have there thought over the Augsburg confession of faith. I have pondered over the two Helvetic confessions when standing in Constance where Huss was martyred; and at Ulm, Paris, Berlin, Edinburgh, Oxford, Gloucester, Smithfield have with deeply solemnized feelings reflected on the words of Calvin, Luther, Knox, Latimer, Cranmer, Zwingle, Hooper, Ridley and other makers of great and venerated creeds, symbols and confessions. These had their use and are precious historic relics. Even in Moscow I have felt the power over vast populations of the Russo-Greek spiritual formularies. But the various enunciations of the convictions of good and consecrated leaders have inextricably confused Christendom. They are parts of the jarring theology which has created the religious Babel that fails to scale the heights above our poor divisions, and to soar into the glory of Christian unity.

As Seen From the Dome

By F. D. Power

While our ship lay at Naples we visited the eternal city. It is no easy task for any man to write of Rome, the "city of infinite riches in a little room," a great world-center of conquest, religion and art for three millenniums. It is appalling to undertake to do Rome in three days, and rash beyond description to venture to write up Rome in one or two, or even twenty letters; but while the Pope has a dome 435 feet from the pavement to the summit of the cross, a few feet higher than ours, he can not see as far, nor look upon so fair a city, nor so great a land as we are accustomed to; so we proceed with some degree of assurance to view his domain and speak of its sights. First, one remembers that "this is Rome which sat on its seven hills and from its throne of beauty ruled the world," and we cross the Tiber, to which I lift my hat, and ascend the Janiculum two hundred and seventy-five feet and fix the range, the Aventine and Esquiline, the Palatine and Celian, the Capitoline and Quirinal and Viminal. Here is the eternal city where under the emperors a million and a half people dwelt, now less than 400,000, with a great history and with prospects of rare and ever varying beauty as we look away to the snow capped Apennines, and off to the blue Mediterranean and along the wooded hills, and over villas and olive gardens, parks and palaces, clustering villages and towns, hoary walls and towers and columns and ruins. It is a great sight. We don't wonder that the artist loves it; nor that the pope is willing to play prisoner within its walls.

Our hotel was near the Pantheon, now one of the eighty churches in Rome, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, the only ancient edifice in the city which is still in perfect preservation as to its walls and vaulting. It is a huge circular structure with a vast colonnade. Its portico, thirty-six yards wide is borne by sixteen Corinthian columns of granite, about forty feet in height. The interior is lighted by a single aperture in the center of the dome which produces so beautiful an effect that it was believed at one time the name "Pantheon" was applied to it from its resemblance to the vault of heaven. Here Rome was hospitable to all the gods. Here is the tomb of Victor Immanuel II. and to the left of the altar rest the bones of Raphael, 1483-1520, dying at that fatal age of 37.

Not far from here I strolled into the Corso, the great street of Rome, corresponding to the ancient Via Flaminia, leading from the capitol. It is gay with shops, and with carriages and pedestrians, and runs for a mile through the city. Along this street and across the Tiber I easily found my way to St. Peter's. The Ponte St. Angelo, and Hadrian's tomb or the castle of St. Angelo, are readily recognized. The tomb is a great cylinder 80 yards in diameter, 160 feet high, and from Hadrian to Caracella all the emperors were interred here. It is a striking monument of ancient Rome used now as a fortress. St. Peter's does not disappoint me. The square on which it is built is entered through an elliptical space, enclosed in imposing colonnades, each with four series of Doric columns. It is a fitting aproach to the greatest church in the world. An obelisk brought from Heliopolis by Caligula is in the center, on either side of which is a splendid fountain. The church is said to have been founded by Constantine and erected on the site of the Circus of Nero where Peter is supposed to have suffered martyrdom. About 1450 the present structure was begun and Michael Angelo is the architect of the great dome so marvelously airy and symmetrical, 1546. The new church was consecrated 1626, and cost over $50,000,000 and takes about $40,000 a year to maintain it. It covers 18,000 square yards. It is a perfect museum of statues, paintings, mosaics, bronzes and marbles; and while its exterior is somewhat disappointing, the effect Michael Angelo intended to produce in this dome being seriously injured by the great portico, the interior with arch upon arch, and dome upon dome, with its superb decorations, is wonderfully impressive. We pass the round slab of porphyry where Charlemagne and other emperors were crowned, between massive Corinthian pillars. On the right is the celebrated "Pieta" by Michael Angelo, a masterpiece, the mother holding the dead body of the son. The group has an ideal beauty. Opposite is the monument of Clement XIII by Canova, with two great marble lions. Farther on by one of the columns is the bronze statue of St. Peter whose toe is worn smooth by a million million kisses. One cannot recognize our old friend of Pentecost in this bronze idol. Still farther, under the bronze canopy beneath the dome, is the tomb of St. Peter, though nobody knows that Peter ever saw Rome or suffered in Rome. The great temple has 55 chapels and services are held in all of them daily. I attended a Sunday service in one of them and heard magnificent music and an eloquent sermon in Italian from Father Gretano Zoreti, a noted Jesuit. Eighty thousand people may gather in St. Peter's.

The Vatican palace, the largest palace in the world, with twenty courts and 11,000 halls, chapels, saloons and apartments is here and the Vatican gardens, library and galleries. Passing the gorgeously decorated Swiss guards, whose garments Michael Angelo invented for the world's admiration, we enter the famous Sistine chapel. Here the masters exhausted themselves. The place is literally crammed with artistic wonders—too crowded by far to be effective. It is supposed to represent the culminating effort of modern art, but I confess even Angelo's "Last Judgment" wearies me. It is too studied. His Christ here, and his prophets and Sibyls in the vaulting of the chapel are triumphs of art. In the Sistine chapel the great services are held and Pius officiates. The sculpture in the Vatican and the Raphael pictures are the center of interest. One needs a month here to take in the exceeding embarrassment of riches. Think of the Transfiguration and the Laocoon, the Apollo Belvedere and Torso of Hercules, the Grecian, Roman, Egyptian and Etruscan treasures. I did not call on "the prisoner of the vatican." In the great dome one reads in Latin around it, painted in letters six feet in length, the words of the great Teacher: "Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram aedificabo ecclesiam meam et tibi dabo claves regni caelorum;" but this was said to the fisherman, and he has no successor.

From these modern things it was good to get away to the Forum and Colosseum. Here we see the unspeakable glory of ancient Rome. The first lies between the capitol and Palatine. This hollow was the scene of the conflict between the Romans under Romulus and the Sabines after the rape of their women, and here later was the center of the republic. Here the great popular assemblies were held and along its Sacra Via the triumphant processions ascended to the capitol. Here were the Temple of Vesta with its eternal fire and the dwelling of the Pontifex Maximus, the temples of Jupiter and of Saturn, of Castor and Pollux, of Concord, of Vespasian, of Cæsar, and of Faustina. Here were the great basilicas, quadrangular courts surrounded by colonnades, the Porcia, Aemilia, Sempronia, and Julia. Here were gilded bronzes and rare marbles, columns, triumphal arches, statues, and works of art and great gatherings when Rome was greatest. Now one surveys the ruins. It is still wonderful. The Arch of Severus is here; and the Column of Phocas; and three splendid columns of the Temple of Castor and Pollux where the Roman Senate met; a part of the Temple of Vespasian and of the Sacra Via; and eight columns of the Temple of Saturn, and the remains of the Rostra or orator's tribune; and the ruins of the Temple of Cæsar in front of which was the rostrum where Mark Antony made his great speech March 20, B. C. 44; and three colossal arches of the Basilica of Constantine erected by Maxentius from which Michael Angelo modelled the vaulting of St. Peter's—acres and acres of majestic ruins!

I passed through the Arch of Titus, commemorating his triumph over the Jews, and dedicated to him by Domitian in 81, as the inscription reads: Senatus Populusque Romanus divo Tito divi Vespasiani filio Vespasiano Augusto. I saw clearly the triumphal procession within with captive Jews, the table with shew-bread, and seven-branched candle-stick. It is all there. Farther on is the triumphal Arch of Constantine, perhaps the most impressive in Rome, erected after his victory over Maxentius when he embraced Christianity. It has three passages, the Central, over the Appian Way. And beside this splendid arch, which should have its imitations in our great Capitol on the Potomac, is the

By B. B. Tyler

The Young Men's Christian Association began and prosecuted a wonderfully successful work in the Japanese army during the recent war with Russia. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, I am sure, will be pleased to receive information as to the attitude of the emperor and minister of war in respect to this work. Two years ago, and more, the war department granted permission to three Young Men's Christian Association secretaries to pitch their tents on the banks of the Yalu River, in the rear of General Kuroki's army. The army at the time was considered closed to Christian workers. The allied Christian bodies had failed to get their representatives to the front, and it was only by most fortunate circumstances that the Young Men's Christian Association was permitted to give a practical exhibition of the nature and value of its work. The beginning was difficult, but once in the field the work spread from the one post on the banks of the Yalu River to eleven bases of the army, so covering the field that at least three-quarters of a million different soldiers were ministered to before the army returned to Japan. To these men were given 3,385,000 pieces of stationery and 416,000 pieces of religious literature. Supplies of buttons, thread, soap, etc., were furnished to 88,000 men, books were loaned to 26,000, and barbers' supplies to more than 152,000. The association secretaries made 764 visits to hospitals and isolated posts, gave 1,752 graphophone concerts and entertainments, and held 613 religious meetings. About 1,566,000 soldiers entered the different branches. This work cost about $30,000 in gold. The emperor and empress gave $5,000. This contribution testifies in an unmistakable and most emphatic way their appreciation of the work of the Young Men's Christian Association with the soldiers of the Japanese army.

Major General Kamio, formerly chief of staff at Dalny, in a public address made the following statements:

"Though I venture to say that everything was completely provided for the prosecution of war, yet I must frankly acknowledge that there was no provision made for the field recreation of the Japanese soldiers; it was entirely outside the Japanese army system.

"In all eleven places where work was definitely organized, the Young Men's Christian Association provided suitable buildings, divided into meeting and music halls, library, reading room, tea room, barber shop, letter writing room, etc. To these rooms soldiers were given free access day and night. The men who had charge of the association received the innumerable soldiers with untiring zeal and kindness. They give the soldiers healthy recreation and everything else they needed, which made them almost forget that they were in the field of war.

"At the same time, the association secretaries visited the military hospitals and distributed newspapers, magazines and pictures among the sick and wounded and comforted them by preaching and lecturing. When the transportation of soldiers to Japan commenced after the restoration of peace, the association provided music at all the principal railway stations and distributed newspapers and magazines among the soldiers thus making them forget the tediousness of the journey.

"I firmly believe that the many-sided work done by the Y. M. C. A. enabled innumerable soldiers to pass their time in the most wholesome and agreeable ways and prevented their being tempted into harmful habits and dissipation. Thus the hundreds of thousands of soldiers made their triumphant return deeply grateful for the warm-hearted service rendered by the association. I believe that the officers of the association as well as those who contributed money and various articles for the work should feel well satisfied that their object was successfully accomplished.

"Let me remark that I can discover two results from the successful work of the association: First, hundreds of thousands of soldiers, representing every class of Japanese society, were made acquainted with the Gospel of Christ; secondly, when these hundreds of thousands returned home, they told their parents, brothers and friends about the kind ministry of the Young Men's Christian Association, and thus many millions more have been made somewhat acquainted with the spirit of the Christian religion."

From beginning to end, the secretaries report the military authorities enthusiastically co-operated in making the work practical, effective, successful. For instance, free transportation for secretaries and supplies and the use of good buildings at the various points were given. Some of the officers gave both time and money to the work. General Oshima, the military governor of Manchuria, recently contributed $500 to continue the work of the associations.

General Terauchi, the minister of war, has sent the following remarkable letter to the president of the national committee of the association:

"The Young Men's Christian Association, moved by the desire to minister to the welfare and comfort of our officers and soldiers at the front, carried on its beneficent work throughout the Russo-Japanese war of 1904-1905. Beginning at Chinampho early in September, 1904, it kept pace with the northward progress of the field forces for nearly twenty long months, until March, 1906, establishing its work at eleven posts in Manchuria and Korea. At large expense of money and labor and by a great variety of means, it filled the leisure of our officers and soldiers, far from home, with wholesome recreation. The completeness of the equipment and the success of the enterprise were universally tested and recognized by our troops in the field. I am fully assured that the recipients of all this generous service are filled with deep and inexpressible gratitude.

"Now, simultaneously with the triumphant return of our armies, as I learn of the successful termination of your enterprise, I take this opportunity to express my heartfelt thanks for your noble services, and at the same time to voice my appreciation of the generosity of all those who have either by gifts or by personal effort supported the work.

(Signed) "M. TERAUCHI,
"Minister of War.

"Tokyo, 28th May, 39th Meiji (1906).
"To Yoichi Honda, Esq.,
"President, The Japanese Young Men's Christian Association Union."

One of my favorite religious papers has a department entitled, "The Progress of the Kingdom." The report that I am making comes most appropriately under this head. Surely the successful work of the Young Men's Christian Association is a bit of information concerning "The Progress of the Kingdom" of righteousness, peace and joy, in which all who are loyal to the Christ will rejoice.

Colosseum, the crowning ruin of the eternal city.

The Colosseum is to me the most imposing structure in the world. Originally it was the Amphitheatrum Flavium completed by Titus A. D. 80. At its opening 5,000 wild animals were killed and the gladiatorial combats lasted 100 days. It seated 87,000 spectators. It is constructed of travertine blocks. The circumference measures 576 yards or nearly one-third of a mile, and its diameter is 205 yards and the height is 156 feet. Above the arena, which is 93 by 58 yards, rise tiers after tiers of seats. Next the Esquiline hill is a well preserved portion four stories high, the first being formed of arcades, the pillars of which are adorned with columns of the Doric, Ionic and Corinthian order. There are four great entrances, two for the emperor and the others for the solemn processions at the games. Through the arcades came the spectators and under the arena were the chambers and dens for wild beasts, and through the passage ways came the Christian martyrs. Only one-third of the gigantic structure remains, but it is indescribable in its majesty. The Colosseum was the symbol of Rome's greatness.

"While stands the Colosseum, Rome shall stand:
When falls the Colosseum, Rome shall fall,
And when Rome falls, the world!"

Modern Religious Persecution---A Defense

By B. L. Chase

3. The Amiableness of Persecutors.

I have often heard men express their surprise at the courage, perseverance and confidence of the persecutor when he is called upon to expose the false teaching of men about whom there is a universal atmosphere of sanctity and integrity. To be able to deal impartially with old and young, learned and unlearned, obscure and illustrious men who are corrupters of the faith, requires a calmness of judgment, a courage of conviction, a forgetfulness of self and of all consequences, possessed by few men. It seems that God calls upon only the most highly and peculiarly endowed men to carry out such delicate, perilous and thankless tasks. No man would consent to act the part of persecutor without long study and preparation, long prayer and fasting.

When one considers the infinite variety of heresies, their subtlety, their cunning elaboration, their profundity, their embodiment in learned language, their tortuous syllogisms, their connection with philosophies hoary with age, one is almost appalled at the learning and skill which are required to understand them, explain them to the "rank and file" of the brethren, and refute them. Take the learned infidelities connected with the modern study of the Old Testament. What knowledge of the Semitic languages, history and ideas it requires—what hours of reading and study to master the scholarly output of German and French scholars, to be able with confidence to pronounce as false a conclusion which has been agreed upon by the majority of learned scholars! And yet the Disciples have defenders of the faith who are putting to silence every week the most learned scholars of the world. They have repeatedly challenged the propagators of false teachings to come to the defense of their mongrel intellectual progeny in the pages of the weekly newspaper; but not one of the great scholars of Europe or America has ever dared to cross swords with our bravest dialecticians. They have called upon Harnack and Wellhausen to reply to them; but they have maintained a discreet silence. They have asked Harper and Briggs to debate the question with them; but they have been too busy to answer their letters. They have, metaphorically speaking, shot the ideas of these men full of holes, but they have let the poor things die without aid, and have not given them so much attention as to offer them a decent burial. The silence of these men when they are being attacked as infidels is sufficient evidence that they have been put to confusion, and know from reading the unanswerable refutations of their ideas that their positions are weak and untenable. They don't believe their own ideas; if they did they would come to their defense.

The Disciples scarcely realize what a few brainy men among them are doing to save the Christian religion from annihilation. The Disciples themselves would have disappeared as a brotherhood about three years ago if it had not been for them. For their signal services on behalf of the "old Jerusalem Gospel," they are deserving of a warmer reception than they are receiving in some quarters. My heart is pained at the thankless way the pictures of one of these men were received in some places when they were offered free of charge beautifully mounted upon a button to be worn upon the coat. It has been reported that copies of that paper which has done more than all other papers put together among the Disciples to hunt out the heretic from his hiding place, were actually taken out and kindled into a bonfire! It would seem that every home among the Disciples would be glad to have the faces of these men hanging upon the wall looking down benignantly upon the little children and the household pets. They are deserving better at our hands than they are receiving. Subscriptions to their newspapers and books are well enough; the use of their Sunday-school helps is well enough; but what they desire above all other things is the unutterable blessedness of being helpful to the brethren. They are here to minister, not to be ministered unto. If any church should desire a minister, nothing would give them greater pleasure than to recommend a man for the place who is known to be "sound." If one of the colleges should be in need of a president or professor, they would count it a pleasure to have the selection of such officers turned over to them. They would even pay the postage on their own letter of appointment. Or if one of the colleges desired an opinion on the soundness of a text book, they would count it no inconvenience to read such a book and pass judgment on it; they would even write one for the purpose. If any of the missionary boards were at a loss for a man as secretary, they would count it no imposition to be asked to nominate a man for the place. I have reason to believe that they would even consent to make up the programs of the various district, state and national conventions, if any of the secretaries should not have time to do so. They desire, above everything else to be useful to the brethren. Let all who desire to reward them as they desire, follow the above suggestions, which I am making without their knowledge.

An India Convention

By Adelaide Gail Frost

I have had such a grand uplift which, more than anything else, seemed like this to me: The curtain of a panorama just beginning to uproll, just far enough for us to catch a glimpse of India To-Be, the wonderful day when the church of Jesus Christ in India shall be ready to meet the bridegroom. Imagine yourselves in a long audience room. Looking up you see the cream colored tiles of the roof, about the walls are blackboards, on which our convention's daily program is written in Hindi and the special song of the convention, a translation of the Glory Song. Above the speaker's stand is the motto of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in Hindi—"The Love of Christ Constraineth Us,"—"Masih ka prem namen bash kar leta hai." The two side rooms like alcoves are filled with the smaller children of the orphanage, and mothers who are not too certain of the behavior of their own "small fry." I must say here that the tiny folk of Miss Burgess' family and David Livigstone Menzies are the prize church babies for model deportment. The front part of the main room is filled with the orphanage girls sitting on mats. Back of them are rows of benches where I looked most often with thankful eyes. There sat the adult Christians of the Hamirpur District, about sixty in all, and we had beside fifteen visitors from outside the district, such earnest faces, cleanly and sufficiently clothed persons, India's own, but more, Christ's own. How they sang, some translated hymns, some songs of praise to Jesus written for their own native airs. The latter they sing with such gusto as to almost make the tiles rattle! I am going to copy some of the notes I took on that occasion that you may have some idea of the way our native brethren and sisters speak. Yakub Ali of Maudha (Ya- koob A- le, the first name means Jacob), who was once a Mohammedan religious teacher, said: "We should have our hearts so filled with the love of Christ that there shall be room for nothing else"—and then it thrilled me to hear that some time Mohammedan leader tell of the difference between the works of Jesus and that of other prophets. "We find no selfishness in him," he said.

One of our young men school teachers said: "We must work to give the gospel to every one of our brothers and sisters."

One young Christian woman said of her work with women: "When we speak lovingly to them then their love turns toward us. Sometimes at first they will close the door and say, 'There is no one to hear,' but later they listen to our words with their hearts, and call us to come back and teach them. We should listen to their tales of joy or sorrow and tell them of One who always understands."

Another young Christian man said: "There are thousands of villages where the Word of the Lord has never been spoken, there shall yet be witnesses who shall speak clearly, but so many are needed now."

Still another said: "When we are one in spirit and prayer and endeavor then it will not be so hard to overcome the great strength of idolatry around us."

A teacher from Rath said (pronounced rot), "Asia should more fully than any other continent in the world understand and follow the teachings of Jesus whose birthplace upon earth was in Asia.."

You can imagine the sensations such words from the lips of those, most of whom had been born into heathenism, would awake in us. Beginnings of great days are dawning.

This meeting was presided over by Yakub Ali, the secretary was also a native brother. I am sure our men missionaries enjoyed being audience most of the time.

It is beginning to grow quite warm. Soon our school will begin at six in the morning. Adelaide Gail Frost.

Reconstruction in Alameda

A good illustration of church extension is found at Alameda, Cal. In 1893 the secretary was on the Pacific coast seeking to know for the board what could be done to aid our people to get good church homes. At that time a corner church lot was selected in Alameda facing the city park. It was the best lot in town. At a cost of $1900 the board purchased it a little later and a church building seating 150 people was erected by the Alameda brethren. After a few reverses the church paid off its debt and grew and was about to build when the terrible fire and earthquake broke up all their plans. But the earthquake also increased their opportunities. Alameda became a refuge city across the bay and at once they must build. A loan was needed and though our board could not see the money coming except by faith, the $5,000 was granted at the earnest solicitation of all the churches and preachers around the Bay. We believe the brotherhood will give this money. We must do some work in faith.

Our New Church Building at Alameda, Cal.

It is an inspiration to read the letters of Bro. Macfarlane. We give one herewith after the loan was granted and also one from Bro. Shepherd. These letters should be read carefully. The extension fund is a great emergency fund. Will our brethren soon get it through their minds—it is an emergency fund to snatch victory from the jaws of defeat. This Alameda case is accentuated by earthquake and by fire. We now have 97 other worthy appeals that have accumulated since March when our board ceased granting loans and it will take $125,000 to answer them. Read the letters and digest them.

G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec.

Dear Brother Muckley—Words can hardly express our gratitude at the receipt of your telegram announcing the granting of a loan of $5,000. The clouds rolled away and enthusiasm kindled immediately. We asked for $5,000 for a Sunday-school room, not hoping to do more than furnish it ourselves; but the prospect of receiving $5,000 from your board led us to plan larger things, and while we felt hardly able to raise a dollar, we are now planning at least an $8,000 building, and the money is coming in so rapidly that we will possibly go to $10,000. Our architect is planning a building which is a marvel at that figure. It will be in the mission style, shingled outside, with wood finish within, and provides for a church auditorium for 400, a Sunday-school room for 400, with nine separate class rooms, a combined auditorium seating 800, and a basement under the Sunday-school room. It will be the most unique and practical church building in the city.

Twelve hundred of the $3,000 we have to raise was subscribed on the day the announcement of your loan was made; $900 of this $1,200 came from people injured financially by the fire. One lady, who made the confession that morning, subscribed $50 before leaving the church; and a gentleman, who is not a member, but whose wife was recently baptized from the Catholic church, and whose entire business was in ruins, voluntarily subscribed $100.

The work in Alameda was just entering upon larger things when the fire crushed our prospects and increased our needs. The church extension board has saved the situation. I have always believed in church extension, but never realized before what it meant to have a great solid institution, such as it is, ready to step into the breach and take up the work which our hands were rendered unable to support.

The lessons of the California earthquake and the San Francisco fire ought to insure an offering of $100,000 for church extension in September.

That you may receive it is the fervent prayer of the Alameda church. Yours faithfully, Alameda, Cal. P. C. Macfarlane.

Dear Brother Muckley—Only those who are confronted with unspeakable devastation and unparalleled opportunity as is conjoined in this bay district of California, can in anywise appreciate the timeliness of your loan of $5,000 to the Alameda brethren. Whatever builds up one of our churches strengthens us all. Whatever help the brethren in need receive from the brotherhood fills all of us with the thrills of renewed courage and determination.

P. C. Macfarlane has been focalizing the moral sense of Alameda for a long time. His well tempered and masterful leadership in civic righteousness has won to our church there a prestige which makes their pitiably inadequate facilities stand out in sharp contrast. Even without the need multiplied manifold by the fire across the bay, that church deserves generous recognition from our people at large. And now that you have granted this timely loan, based on your faith in our brotherly sentiments we applaud your board unstintedly.

Bear with one further word. Some of our belated brethren, for whatever reason, withhold support from our church extension work. This loan to Alameda is but another instance added to the already long list of providential helps you have been able to minister to the growing needs of our church. Keep up the good work, as you can not fail to do, and gradually you will force into the open the actual basis of opposition and neglect of church extension work, timid faith in a penurious Christ or a penurious faith in a Christ who is not alive nowadays. The dear Lord forgive our misrepresentations of his bountiful care for his children and his church.

Get that $1,000,000 fund as quickly as possible. Future emergencies may not rise from fire and quaking earth, but emergencies are rising all about us all the time. Loyally yours,

R. P. Shepherd.

The Passing of a Veteran.

By F. D Power.

Dexter A. Snow, eldest son of Asiel Snow, was born in Staunton, Va., May 20, 1819. His father and mother, Mary Snow (nee Mary Bullard) were both from Massachusetts and emigrated to Virginia about the year 1818. They moved from Staunton, Va., to Christiansburg, Va., when their first born was an infant, where they lived until the death of his mother in 1830, leaving three children, Dexter, Harriet and Stillman. His mother was the eldest daughter of Daniel Bullard and his wife, Mary Bullard, and was a devout Christian woman. It was the early teaching of his mother and the later influence of his grandmother Bullard, and that of his uncle Chester C. Bullard, that gave the religious direction to the mind and life of this boy. The prayers of the mother for the child, kneeling at his bedside with her hands on his head, had a restraining effect upon his tendency to sin; and in the after years of his life, the sudden memory of those prayers often checked a wicked impulse and arrested a sinful act.

At the age of 16 he obeyed the Gospel under the preaching of Dr. Chester Bullard and was the first convert to the Christian religion, as we preached it, west of New River. To obey the Gospel, to be baptized, was a very unpopular move in those days, for it brought social and religious proscription. Others soon followed, however; a church was organized, and Dexter was pressed to take an active part in religious worship. At the age of 19 he was urged by Dr. Bullard to fill a round of appointments in the adjacent counties. These were his first efforts in the pulpit. He remembers them as very feeble and short discourses, listened to more because of the boyish appearance of the speaker, than for any point or wisdom of their own.

Up to this time Dexter had been a hard laborer from childhood, rising always at 5 o'clock of mornings to feed horses and cattle, breakfasting by candle light, and then in winter time walking three miles to school.

At the age of 20 his father gave him the privilege of more study and he sought to improve his mind and get a better education by teaching school. Afterwards he resumed studies at school, paying his way with his earnings as a teacher. This he did until 23 years of age, at which time he married Catharine Salome Ammen, November 29, 1842. For the next four years so great was the struggle with poverty, and such the unpopularity of this new plea, that no regular preaching was done by him.

After securing a little house of his own, with the assistance of his father-in-law, he began to fill regular preaching appointments again. All preaching was done by him without remuneration, for it was decidedly unpopular in thost days to speak of pay for preaching. It was considered an indication of selfishness and lack of religion for a preacher to expect, want or even need money.

It was quite common for him to ride thirty miles and preach twice on Sunday; and he was greatly encouraged to have large audiences, numerous additions to the church, and more calls to preach. In 1854 he was called to evangelize for the Southwest Virginia District Cooperation, at a pledged salary of $300 a year, he to furnish his own horse. This work was very laborious. It took eight weeks to make the round trip, and for two years he averaged two sermons a day. He was successful in this work and could relate incidents and experiences connected with it sufficient to fill a volume. The yearly pledges for these labors were only paid in part and he was compelled to give up this field in order to support his little family. This part of the narrative would be incomplete if mention were not made of the silent, patient suffering and privation of his wife, alone at home, with her three children.

From 1856 to 1860 he was associated with his father and others in secular pursuits, all the time preaching on Sundays to churches from ten to thirty miles from home, also assisting evangelists in protracted efforts. In the summer of 1860 he went to the Alleghany Springs, Va., in a very feeble state of health. While there he met Col. W. T. Withers, then of Jackson, Miss., now of Lexington, Ky., who offered him the pastorship of the Disciples' church in Jackson, Miss. He accepted and went to his new charge in September, 1860.

Here he remained eight months only, with but little visible success. The spirit of war had taken possession of the people of the south, the city was in a state of ebullition and excitement, and the secession convention was in session there when he resigned and returned to Virginia, May, 1861. He found his own state also so full of martial excitement that little was done during the next four years in the way of successful preaching. But what was disastrous to many financially, was not so to him; for at the close of the war he found himself out of debt and possessed of a competency, for which he was so profoundly grateful that he felt the means in his hands was a loan from the Lord to be used for the advancement of his kingdom.

For the purpose of doing a special work for the Lord, and in order not to build on another's foundation, he selected Wytheville, Va., a town full of bitter opposition to our plea, as a new field of work. So bitter was the hostility that no church door was opened for the funeral of one of our sisters who died there about this time. Brother Snow's theory was that, as a people, we were too combative and had closed the ears of thousands by our rough exposure of their faith and practice. His cherished plan was to go among them, preaching simply the truth, and attacking no sect. By exemplary Christian deportment he sought to silence opposition, endeavoring first to gain their ears and then to preach to them a changed heart and life on the part of the baptized.

Before one year had passed he was having confessions, churches were opened to him and every courtesy extended by the other religious bodies of the town. In two years a small congregation was organized and the church grew until a house of worship was demanded. A friend donated the ground for this purpose; and although the brethren were poor they did what they could. Brother Snow had large opportunity to use the fund which the Lord had lent him, and gave twenty years of his life and a goodly portion of his substance, preaching all this time without pay, building other houses of worship in the county, employing other preachers to come and hold protracted meetings, and paying their expenses himself. There are now three churches, all with houses of worship, within a radius of five miles of Wytheville. The Wytheville church has, for the last five years, supported a pastor, and it

—Where is the "boy preacher"?

—He certainly is not in print as he used to be.

—It can not be said he is older. We rejoice that the genus is perennial.

—He is as ambitious now and is working as earnestly as ever but is not so much in the lime light to-day because —— —Our churches are manifesting greater appreciation of Christian experience and mature wisdom and are lengthening the period of their usefulness for studious, devoted ministers.

—Observation unmistakably reveals that the ministerial dead line is changed. If it is anywhere, it is ten years further west than it used to be. Ben Tyler has reached the Rockies but has not seen it yet. None of our preachers do who read the Christian-Evangelist, the latest books and prepare new sermons.

—Tell this to the boys. Many of them are restrained from entering the ministry through fear that doors of opportunity close to all preachers soon as even the earlier frosts of the years fall on their hair. We have learned it is age rather than years before which the doors swing inward. The power inherent in a long life of consecrated ability is now at a premium and will continue to be. This should cheer every preacher and form a new tie between him and his study. It is rich with significance to the church of the next decade.

—Arthur N. Lindsey, New Brooklin, Mo., was elected chaplain of the Missouri Drummers' Association at their late Booneville convention.

—H. F. McLane, of Hiram, O., has some open time for meetings after September 1. He will give prompt attention to any calls for help.

—Evangelists Fife and Saunders are in a meeting at Converse, Mo. We hope for reports showing this excellent church greatly increased numerically and otherwise.

—James A. Brown, who graduated from Hiram last June, began with the Hartford (Mich.) church, July 8. He reports excellent prospects for the growth of the Hartford congregation.

—L. E. Sellers reports that the Pisgah, Ill., congregation has recently purchased a lot for their new church home. Walter Carpenter will give his time to financing the building enterprise.

—Dr. J. G. M. Luttenberger sailed on the Kron Prinz Wilhelm, on the 31st ult., for Berlin, where he will devote several months to special hospital work, further fitting himself for his professional career.

—With most appropriate services the corner stone of the Broad Street Church of Christ, Columbus, O., was laid, June 29. W. S. Priest's ministry with that people is being greatly blessed.

—W. W. Wharton, Jacksonville, Ill., can place inquirers in communication with a worthy brother who is employed half time with one church and wishes to assist another congregation with the balance.

—O. B. Clark, of the department of history, Drake University, reports an attendance of over 600 through the summer sessions. Brother Clark will spend the balance of the summer at his old Illinois home near Bloomington.

—Roseberry, Idaho, offers good inducements to a first-class creamery man and to a physician who will bring with him or buy a stock of drugs. Members of the Christian Church preferred. Write Bro. H. C. Varner.

—J. W. Lowber, of Austin, delivered a lecture before the Texas Chautauqua, Mineral Wells, on the "Evolution of Democracy and the Future of Our Country," which was published in full in the Austin "Tribune."

—The Miami (Mo.) church gave $30 for foreign missions in March, and $20 for American missions on Children's day. An Endeavor society of twenty members was recently organized. Evangelistic meetings will begin in October.

—Miss Madge L. Kent, who has served the Central Christian church at Terre Haute (Ind.) as assistant pastor for the past three years, resigned her position July 1, and is now at her home in Chagrin Falls, Ohio, taking a much needed rest.

—G. A. Gordon, a Lexington Bible student, has just closed a very successful meeting at McKinney, Ky. A church of 45 members, and a very promising Bible school were organized. W. L. Ewers was selected as pastor of this young flock.

—Frank M. Dowling has returned to his beloved Pasadena, Cal. We hope this move signifies his restoration to health, and that his unusual gifts of learning and eloquence will hereafter be more exclusively devoted to preaching and writing the Word.

—W. M. Semones, Nampa, Idaho, informs us the church there met for the first time in its new home last Lord's day. Three were added to the membership, by letter. A minister will soon be called to the pastorate of the churches at Nampa and Meridian.

—Louis S. Cupp has not yet completed his first year with the Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, but has had 76 additions to the membership. The growth of our Kansas City congregations is an inspiration to the entire brotherhood.

—W. J. Lhamon was chief lecturer at the preachers' institute held in conjunction with the recent Nebraska state meeting at Bethany. He held the same office there three years ago. It is needless to say that Brother Lhamon's lectures were an invaluable feature of the assembly.

—The new church building at Sapulpa, I. T., was dedicated by the pastor, A. M. Harral, and his people June 22. Brother Randolph, of Tulsa, is assisting in a brief meeting, which has had a good start. The Bible school attendance has doubled during the year.

—H. A. Northcutt, evangelist, and John S. Zeran and wife, singers, are helping E. H. Holmes in a meeting at Plano, Texas. There have been 40 additions to date. Brother Northcutt's next meeting will be with his home church, at Knox City, Mo.

—E. B. Bagby will spend the next month at Bethany, recuperating for his winter's campaign in the capital of the nation. Like all preachers, he must have his favorite paper during vacation time. The Christian-Evangelist will follow him, and our other readers to their summer vacations on notification.

—W. A. Haynes, of Skidmore, Mo., begins general evangelistic work as soon as opportunity comes. Though but 32 years of age, he has been in the ministry 17 years. He is completing his fourth year at Skidmore, his first and only pastorate. His services should be called into immediate requisition.

—A Charlottesville (Va.) daily gives an extended account of the final payments being made on all indebtedness against our church in that city, and of the great success attending the ministry of C. R. Sine with our people there. It is a pleasure to know that Brother Sine will continue his pastorate in that important religious and educational center.

—Charles M. Farnham, of Newberry, Ind., offers his services to the churches as a general evangelist. Brother Farnham holds degrees from two universities, and is otherwise well equipped for this ministry. He has no fixed charges, but depends on voluntary contributions for his support.

—Braymer, Mo., is prospering under the pastorate of S. W. Crutcher. On June 22 the last mortgage note owing the board of church extension was burned. The church is but five years old, has the best building in the town, and is rapidly growing in numbers and influence.

—Erwin Taylor LeBaron recently resigned his pastorate at Macon, Mo., to re-enter the evangelistic field September 1. He desires the help of a brother singing evangelist, who can play the instrument when necessary. Brother LeBaron's past ministry gives promise of his helping multitudes into the kingdom.

—One of the elders of the Mechanicsburg (Ill.) church writes that L. A. Chapman, who has labored there the past few years, is leaving the church much stronger financially and better equipped in every way for aggressive work than it has ever been in his knowledge of the church.

—We very much regret to read in Sec. W. L. Lowe's Kansas letter, that he has resigned the office which he has so capably filled the last nine years. We can easily read in his successes a call to continue for many years. We hope Brother Lowe will also read it clear and not insist on his resignation being accepted.

—Herb. Lewis, of Gravette, Ark., writes that the local congregation has pledged $350 for the salary of a resident minister for half time. There are good opportunities for his engaging the other half within easy access of Gravette. A significant line is "a middle-aged man, nonantagonistic, preferred."

—Herman P. Williams, of Vigan, Philippine Islands, reports ten baptisms recently at Santo Domingo. The Bible college has opened for its second year's work, with seven students. This sounds like the day of small things, but there are those living who will yet see the full corn in the ear in those far-away islands.

—The beautiful new church at Acampo, Cal., recently erected for the Christian Colony Church, of Acampo, has been dedicated free of indebtedness. J. V. Coombs conducted the services. Brother Coombs writes that J. P. Dargitz has been the moving spirit in establishing that promising congregation.

—F. E. Giles, Haverhill, Mass., informs us that his church board unanimously voted to let the pastor, W. C. Crerie, go to Manchester to assist Herbert Yeuell in the attempt to establish a church of Christ in that city. A fellow feeling makes the New England brethren wonderfully kind to one another.

—E. T. Wise, East Liverpool, Ohio, reports his audiences holding up remarkably well during the summer. A great Endeavor and Bible school rally will be begun September 1. The churches of East Liverpool and Wellsville have arranged jointly to become a Living Link. Two were recently added to the East Liverpool membership.

—S. J. Vance is in a meeting at Reger, Mo. Since we have no building there, the meeting will be held in the Methodist church house. Brother Vance thinks he has a fine opportunity of trying federation, co-operation, and union, all at once and expresses a willingness to undertake the experiment. He hopes soon to report good results.

—A. H. Brown, Greenwood, Ind., informs us the church there is in a very prosperous condition and is greatly enjoying the ministry of Geo. W. Winfrey. During the month two were added to the church by letter and three by primary obedience.

—T. P. Reid has been called to the pastorate of the Acampo (Cal.) church. With their new building and an enthusiastic and consecrated congregation, he may expect great progressiveness in the extension of the kingdom in that part of the Lord's vineyard, which is literally "a vineyard."

—The ninth annual session of the Piedmont assembly will meet with the Gordonsville (Va.) church from July 27 to August 5. Among the names of those on the program from without that district, we note C. A. Young, Chicago; E. L. Powell, Louisville; P. A. Cave, Maysville, Ky., and B. P. Smith, Atlanta, Ga.

—Cephas Shelburne writes that the church at Hunting, Ind., closes a year's work in the theatre and will move into their new church home first Sunday in September. This will be one of the most complete church buildings in the brotherhood. Brother Shelburne will spend the month of August at Long Lake, Mich.

—For the first time the work of our Bible Chair at Charlottesville, Va., under the superintendency of William Forrest, will be affiliated with the university, and due credit be given for work done in the Bible department. It is a pleasure to note this evidence of appreciation of Brother Forrest's work by the university trustees.

—Our Oklahoma brethren will meet in their fifteenth and last territorial convention at El Reno, September 3-6. A strong program has been prepared. The largest attendance in the history of our missionary work in that land of wonders is expected. Pastor O. L. Smith and his hospitable people extend a cordial welcome to all.

—Earl M. Todd sends the sad news that W. C. Hull, for five years pastor of the North Tonawanda (N. Y.) church, lies in a Brooklyn hospital with a fractured skull, caused by falling from a moving train. It was first thought to be a fatal accident, but a successful operation gives hopes of ultimate recovery.

—George P. Rutledge, of the Third Church, Philadelphia, was recently elected vice president of the Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Union, and Clarence H. Chain, one of the trustees of his church, was elected president of the Philadelphia Endeavor Union. It is gratifying to see our brethren assuming leadership in this great movement.

—J. M. Bailey has been called by the Pettis county (Mo.) missionary board to act as county evangelist for the ensuing year. The Lamont church has given liberally for missions and is now sending its pastor, I. H. Fuller, to a country church for afternoon and evening services once each month. Chas. H. Altheide, of Bloomfield, Ia., is now assisting him in a protracted meeting at this mission.

—Evangelist E. E. Violett and wife paid the office force a very enjoyable visit en route to Winchester, Ill., where they began revival services June 29. They will have The Christian-Evangelist placed in every home in the town and sent far into the country. This will not only insure a big tent full of people, but will prepare listeners for Brother Violett's earnest preaching of the cross.

—J. H. Brooks, of Blytheville, secretary of northeast Arkansas missionary district, sends an appeal for preachers of ability and sterling character to come there and help develop the religious opportunities of that rapidly growing part of the new south. He commends it, too, as a place in which our brethren can most advantageously make investments and locate homes. He will gladly answer all letters containing return postage.

—Bro. J. Durham, Irvington, Cal., reports having recently baptized an excellent business woman of Clay, Cal., who listened to him preach on "Objections to Baptism Removed." She stated that all her objections were removed. It is thought her example will have many followers. At Elliott, Cal., he recently baptized a deaf, mute, student of Berkley. The scene at her confession and baptism is reported as being most beautiful and affecting.

—E. F. Henderson, the colored evangelist, is engaged in a very promising work with his people in Los Angeles, Cal. There are more than 12,000 negroes in the city and the number is rapidly increasing. A mission for their benefit was recently started by the philanthropic B. F. Coulter and his Broadway congregation. He has just presented them with a commodious new church home and will help sustain Brother Henderson till the church becomes self-supporting.

—I. H. Fuller has convicted the Sedalia preachers of being "federationists." The entire band took their families and suppers and a bag of horseshoes to the park last Friday evening and spent the time in merry-making and planning for the advancement of their common Christianity. One said of them, "Behold, how they love one another." While it is not in the indictment, we are led to believe that our own J. M. Rudy and W. F. Hamann were among the chief conspirators.

—"The Martin family" will soon make an experiment that is unique even in these days of resourceful evangelism. Brother Martin has purchased a large portable steel tabernacle, in which to hold meetings after October 1. While this will be an added expense, he feels that it will be justified by giving him opportunity to preach to more people than can be accommodated in the ordinary church building. During his recent meetings in Kentucky over 300 were added to the churches.

—G. Lyle Smith, whose work at the Central in Waco, Texas, has been characterized by great success, has tendered his resignation as pastor and, though it was rejected by a practically unanimous vote of the church, he yet feels it is best for him to change his field of labor. After September 1 he will be open to engagement elsewhere. Brother Smith is an able, devoted, minister and will prove a great blessing to any church where his lines may be cast.

—Joseph Utterback reports the Christian colony congregation east of Acampo, Cal., is in the enjoyment of great spiritual blessedness. A band of forty-six have been gathered into a New Testament church, dwelling together in brotherly love. A Christian Endeavor society of forty members and a Bible school of fifty-five have been organized. The well furnished church house is as good as paid for and there are bright prospects of greatly increased usefulness before the church.

—George C. Ritchey has concluded a very successful meeting at Rupert, Idaho. A young preacher and his wife are needed there at once. The church can pay a salary of $600. Bro. Ritchey writes that Rupert is desert now, but in a short time will blossom like a rose. Water from the mighty Snake will be turned on the land in a few months, then homesteads will assume new appearance. The new minister may homestead, and increase in the value of his claim will largely supplement his salary. Address W. J. Flake, elder.

ordering literature and collection envelopes, and tell the Board you will take the offering.

The Annuity feature of Church Extension is profitable to you and the Board. You receive 6 per cent and the Board builds churches with your money. Write for information to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo.

—J. G. Waggoner, our Illinois correspondent, is almost invariably correct in his statements, but erred in last week's Christian-Evangelist in stating that Pekin, Ill., with 87 subscribers has our largest Illinois list of readers. S. S. Jones, Danville, Ill., might whisper that the Christian-Evangelist is welcomed into 128 homes in that city of about the same size. Brother Barnett is entitled to much praise, however, for so quickly and greatly increasing the interest in good religious literature in our Pekin congregation.

joins the long list of those who are entering the distinctively evangelistic field. An authorized statement from the official board is to the effect that the congregation reluctantly accepted Brother Brundige's resignation, and only because of the physician's advice that he must make his home in a drier climate. He is highly commended to the churches by the people among whom he has labored.

—T. M. Mayers, of Eureka Springs, recently concluded a very successful meeting at Fordyce, Ark. E. M. Berry, the beloved pastor of the Fordyce church, is dangerously ill and his people have united in a request that brethren everywhere unite with them in prayers for his recovery. We request every reader to comply with their desire for fellowship before the throne of grace.

—E. B. Scofield writes that the opening of Bethany assembly was the most auspicious of any in its history. President L. L. Carpenter's lecture based on his recent tour of the Holy Land, was very entertaining and instructive. A. L. Crim made one of the best temperance addresses ever heard at the park. Brother Scofield was re-elected president of the State Sunday-school convention, and T. J. Legg was called to his fifteenth year's work as State Sunday-school evangelist. The assembly continues to August 12. All who attend will doubtless be greatly benefited.

—J. H. Mohorter, secretary of our National Benevolences, has just returned from a tour among eastern churches that embraced Poestenkill, Troy, Gloversville, Eagle Mills, Syracuse, East Aurora and Buffalo, N. Y., West Rupert, Vt., Danbury, Conn., and Jefferson, Ravena and Ashland, O., in its scope. He attended the dedication of the new Cleveland Orphanage, and the New York convention of Disciples while swinging this circle. Everywhere he found great encouragement for "the Gospel of the Helping Hand." Bro. Mohorter is justifying the fondest expectations of those who rejoiced over his acceptance of his position in this holy ministry.

—William J. Russell, of Frankfort, Ind., writes: "Gloria in Excelsis" is the most progressive and up-to-date church hymnal of the twentieth century. Its value has been tested in the First Christian Church of Frankfort, Ind. It is superb in its binding, and it is the first hymn book published by the Disciples of Christ that has size enough to make it worthy to be called a Church Hymnal. Its responsive readings are rich in variety, and these are essential to the enrichment of the Lord's day morning service. It contains the best of all that is found in the old and the new hymnologies. It is a delight to my people, and has given dignity and spiritual tone to our services."

—The Board of Church Extension has recently been the recipient of six gifts on the Annuity Plan, aggregating $7,200. $5,000 of this amount is from a friend in Illinois 89 years old; $1,000 is from a friend in Missouri; two $500 gifts came from friends in Iowa; $100 from Arkansas; and the other $100 from Kansas. This last is the 171st gift to the Annuity Fund. This makes, including the Logan fund, nearly $185,000 in the Church Extension Annuity fund. There is no safer place to put annuity money, because we have over $565,000 in our Church Extension fund which is increasing from day to day, as security for our annuity bonds. Address G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo., for information.

—I. H. Fuller, our enterprising Lamont (Mo.) minister, utilized all his church delegates to the Hannibal convention in reporting that inspiring assembly to his townsmen. At a meeting held in the church the following Monday evening all the delegates gave their impressions of the C. W. B. M. sessions of the convention. Tuesday night all reported the Christian Endeavor convention, each of the delegates emphasizing some special feature of the Endeavor sessions. On Wednesday and Thursday evenings other departments of the convention were considered in the same manner. The delegates gave five minute reports and Brother Fuller would conclude the meeting with a twenty minute address on the great interests considered. He highly recommends the plan to other ministers.

—It is difficult to repress a protest against conditions that drive little children into the rounds of toil at such tender ages in our great cities. On the car this morning were three little girls not yet in their teens carrying lunches to one of the great mills. Though clean they could not be said to have "bright morning faces;" they were nervous, careworn and almost uncanny in their premature age. They have had no childhood. O, that they could have been sent to the nursery rather than to the pitiless mill. Drink, corporate greed, poverty drive them there. Possibly extravagance, lack of paternal love, or shiftlessness let them go, at least they are there and ought not be. Christianity is their only deliverer. O Church of Christ, emancipate these little white slaves, unfurl the roses where lilies pale in their faces, and give them all the liberties he would have them enjoy who took them in his arms and blessed them!

—Read Herbert Yeuell's inspiring telegram on page 987. That this intense interest in the plea of this Restoration could be created in one summer month amidst such conservatism as prevails in Manchester is complete justification of Editor J. H. Garrison's attempt to establish a New Testament church in New Hampshire before our next national convention. Though compelled by local conditions to desist for a few weeks, Brother Crerie, of Haverhill, Mass., is on the ground and will fully conserve all the good accomplished so that the meeting can be resumed with a nucleus of local support entirely wanting at the beginning. It is now clearly demonstrated that where we determine to do so, there we can establish a church. With victory so nearly assured it would be sinning against a great opportunity not to complete this enterprise and bejewel that part of New England with a church patterned in every particular after the Jerusalem model. Let contributions for this special work continue. They will be acknowledged through these columns and economically applied to this pious design. Soon the hearts of the givers will be gladdened by reports of the institution of the new church.

—Evangelist Charles Reign Scoville has received more than 500 calls for evangelistic meetings within a single year. This shows the great demand for evangelistic work. Dozens of more evangelists of character and ability are needed in our ranks. We have plenty of some kinds, too many of others, but not enough real men in this work. Appreciating the very great need in this direction, Brother Scoville has come forward with a liberal offer. He proposes to put into the hands of the National Secretary of Evangelism during this year $300 to be used in supporting an evangelist in some needy field under direction of the Board of Evangelism. This contribution, in itself, will constitute Brother Scoville the supporter of a living link evangelist under our board. It is thought that a capable man can raise the remainder of his salary on the field, even though he occasionally be sent to a place which could not pay him for his services. We have very few evangelists or preachers who could make such a liberal offer as this, but those of our brethren who are abundantly able to give $300 per year are legion. We call upon others for similar gifts in order that hundreds of calls for evangelists may be answered within the next year.

Buffalo Railroad Rates.

Concerning the rates to the International convention, we are authorized to state that the Trunk Line association, which covers the territory east of Buffalo, has granted a rate of a fare and one-third on the certificate plan; that the Western Passenger association, covering the territory west of Chicago and St. Louis, has granted a rate of one lowest regular first-class tariff fare plus two dollars from points in the territory to Buffalo and return, date of sale October 10-12, inclusive, tickets good for return from Buffalo until (including) the 19th; Central Passenger association, one fare plus one dollar, covering territory east of the Mississippi, west of Buffalo, north of the Ohio river, tickets to be sold October 11, 12, and 13, with return limit of October 19. The New England Passenger association has advised us that they have authorized the rate of one fare and one-third on the certificate plan. The Southwestern Association has granted a rate of one fare plus two dollars for the round trip. We confidently expect the Southeastern association to make equally as good a rate.

The Trunk Line association has made a special authorization of one and one-half cents per mile per capita between points visited for guaranteed party of one hundred or more going via New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore to Washington returning direct to Buffalo within limit of ticket to Buffalo. Those desiring to take this trip should communicate with Brother George L. Snively of St. Louis, who has been instrumental in organizing. These rates ought to insure us the largest attendance that has ever been recorded at any of our conventions.

Buffalo is just on the border of the territory wherein our great strength lies. This year the convention is held on eastern territory and in the state of New York, where we have long sought to make an impression. This ought to be another incentive to our people to assemble upon this rich home missionary territory.

Many people will avail themselves of the opportunity to take a trip to Niagara Falls, which is about an hour's ride above the city. Many will want to go to Canada; some will want to proceed to New York or Washington or Baltimore. Provision is being made for all these trips and we hope to announce arrangements for parties later.

We have reason to believe that this will be a year of great advancement in all departments of our co-operative work. The convention program has been completed, and we confidently believe that the program which the home society will present this year has never been excelled.

If anyone desires information upon particular matters let him write to R. H. Miller, 255 West Utica Street, Buffalo, who will refer his letter to the proper committee chairman for reply.

If Herbert Yeuell's efforts to establish a church in New Hampshire modeled perfectly after the New Testament pattern should fail for lack of financial support, many able to give would deeply regret their having wasted this opportunity for coming to the help of the Lord against the mighty. But $1 was received last week, while expenses are $250. Register your desire for the advancement for this Restoration in New England by sending a draft to J. H. Garrison, "for New Hampshire Fund."

District Meeting.

The Seventh District (Mo.) convention was held at Camden Point July 23-25. Delightful weather and the hospitality of the Disciples of that prosperous section of Platte county, together with the fellowship of kindred souls, made it a season of great refreshing to the thirty preachers and other workers in attendance. Among the speakers and topics were: E. B. Bourland, "The Preacher and His Relation to Social Problems;" J. P. Pinkerton, "The Preacher and His Spiritual Life;" C. M. Chilton, "Raising Money for Missions;" J. H. Hardin, "Bible School Work;" A. E. Corey, "The Trail of the Dragon;" E. L. Barham, "Our Schools and Colleges;" M. M. Goode, "Does the New Testament Furnish a Sufficient Basis for the Union of all Christians?" These addresses were followed by discussions that were very helpful.

A practical work of the conference was the adoption of a plan of co-operation for the association, with the hope that other churches will accept it, and join in an effort to advance the cause of Christ in Northwest Missouri. A plan of co-operation will soon be presented through our papers, and details will not be given here. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: C. M. Chilton, president; T. H. Capp, E. C. Whitaker and George C. McGee, vice-presidents; C. A. Lowe, of St. Joseph, secretary and treasurer. The above officers constitute the executive committee. The plan contemplates co-operation with the state board, which will be asked to locate a district secretary or evangelist at St. Joseph, the state board and district board acting together in directing his work. The next convention will meet at Chillicothe, Mo., July 22-24, 1907.

Missouri State Bible School Work.

Missouri Bible school work has been advancing satisfactorily since our great convention at Hannibal. We hope for one of the most effective years in the history of the association.

The state superintendent held institutes at Joplin and Windsor, July 13-15 and 20-22, respectively. These were well attended and proved effective. Teacher-training classes were organized at both places. At Joplin, addresses were made in both the First and Second churches. Great work is being done in that region.

District conventions were attended at Sweet Springs and Camden Point, districts Nos. 2 and 7, and at both of these places the superintendent made addresses and assisted in the organization of the districts. Much is to be hoped from these district organizations.

County conventions were attended at Pickering and Kearney. These conventions were largely attended, enthusiastic and quite effective for the support of missionary intelligence and for the training of forces in the Lord's work.

On the evening of July 12 were held the graduating exercises of the Ivanhoe Park

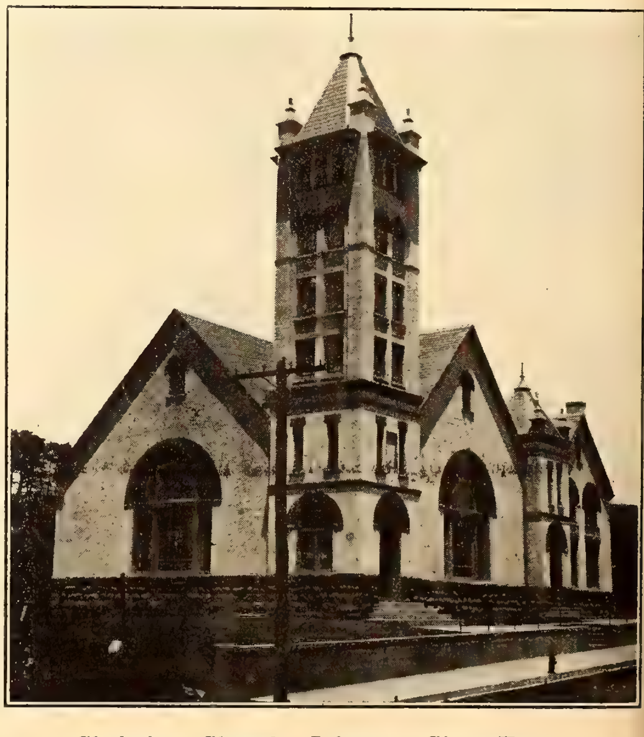
SOME OF OUR CHURCHES RECENTLY DEDICATED.



Christian Church, Johnson City, Tenn.

One of the unexplained "postal mysteries" is our delay in getting J. Len Keevil's beautiful description of the dedication of the Johnson City (Tenn.) Church. This modern structure was dedicated by Z. T. Sweeney, June 10. Brother Keevil says that while Tennessee may be conservative in some respects she is not one whit behind our most progressive states in adding new church buildings to our Centennial list, and raising money for the payment of church debts. Brother Sweeney asked for $10,000; in a short time $15,000—$5,000 more than enough to meet all obligations—were secured. The new church has the best location in the city. The foundations are of native blue limestone, laid in cement; the tower rises 86 feet; the walls up to the windows are of dressed stone; the upper walls are of gray granite brick, with arches of red pressed brick; the roof is of the best Virginia slate. The auditorium has the bowled floor, and is seated with circular pews; seating capacity is about 1,200. It has numerous class rooms and other facilities for Bible school, Endeavor and institutional work. Brother Keevil pays an eloquent tribute to the generosity and faithfulness of his official board and other members of the church, and with his characteristic self-forgetfulness, gives them all the credit of this splendid achievement.

Harrison, Ark.

The Christian congregation of Harrison, Ark., was organized by W. B. Flippin soon after the civil war, and with many trials and difficulties has continued a faithful band of Disciples. From its organization its growth has been phenomenal, considering the "anti" element with which it has had to contend. In 1891 the old building becoming too small for worship of the congregation the present house was planned but on account of deaths and removals was not finished till J. A. Deatherage came last year. The building is of brick and stone, modern in all its equipments, costing $8,000. The building was dedicated without debt July 22. All other churches of the city assisted with their pastors in this service. Brother Deatherage preached the dedication sermon. We cannot speak too highly of our talented pastor whose noble example and lofty eloquence has stirred the hearts of the people here to so many grand actions.

P. J. Cleaveland.

teacher-training class, the first of our classes to finish their course and receive their diplomas. There were eleven graduates. The pastor, L. P. Kopp, is one ot the most effective teachers to be found anywhere.

Now that we are well started for the present year, it remains for every superintendent, teacher, and pastor in the state, to give their earnest and prompt support to the Bible school work to insure gratifying results. Notices regarding the first quarter of the pledges made at Hannibal have been sent out and every one should make it a point to respond at once. Remember that the pledges are due quarterly, the 1st of July, October, January, and April. It will be much easier to pay these pledges in quarterly installments than to wait until the end of the year and have all to pay at once. J. H. HARDIN, State Supt.

The Churches to Blame.

In reply to your request to say something concerning the supply of preachers for our churches, I may say briefly that the chief difficulty lies with the churches. Time was when the churches were active in seeking out among its members worthy young men for the ministry, and these young men were encouraged to enter some college and prepare themselves for the great work to which they aspired. In short, the churches really furnished the material, and often helped to educate these young men. The case now is very different. Very few churches seem to feel any special interest in the education of their young men for the ministry. If a young man goes to college from any of our churches, it is probable that very few in the church know anything about his movements, and most of them care even less. This compels the young man to go, if he goes at all, without feeling that he has the church behind him, or any sympathy from the church as a whole, even if a few members should take an interest in him. But very generally, no one seems to care when or where he goes or what he may do. I do not charge this as wilful indifference upon the part of the churches. It seems to have become a habit, and now no one feels that there is any wrong in it, or even want of sympathy with the young man. Churches act upon the principle that "What is everybody's business is nobody's business," and as there is no organized effort to find and encourage young men to enter the ministry, the whole matter is left to take care of itself without any help whatever from the church.

Of course, there are other reasons why it is difficult to find young men willing to enter the ministry, but I believe the one I have given is the most fundamental and is really working very great evil at the present time.

South Kentucky's Secretary Reminiscent.

Fifty-one to-day. What a wonderful thing it is to live—yes even in the flesh—and meet the realities of life. What great problems to solve! What wonderful obligations to confront! Fifty-one years old to-day, June 28, 1906. More of this life passed away than there is to come. Fifty-one years old to-day. Not so many mistakes in the future as have been made in the past, let us hope and trust. Fifty-one years old to-day, and how is it with me? Not many of the family left—only one sister out of a large family of five boys and six girls—somewhat lonesome do you say? No! No! not much after all, for "Thou art with me," saith David. "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," saith the Lord.

Fifty-one years old to-day, and out of a family of our own of six children, only one precious boy remains in the flesh with us, while the others are our "guardian angels," may we not believe?

Fifty-one years old to-day, and what are the prospects for the future of this life? Very hopeful indeed. God is blessing us as never before and crowning our labors in South Kentucky with abundant success. Two months of our missionary year gone and nearly $1,500 of the $4,000 we are going to raise for South Kentucky missions this missionary year, already raised in cash and good pledges. That will do very well, don't you think? I do. Besides the summer campaign is just now on. Two days from this date we enter the evangelistic field for the entire summer and fall, reaching to December 15. Let us all work to one great end—that of saving the lost around us. We are every day one day's march nearer home than ever before, when a day's work for the Lord is done.

Fifty-one years old this 28th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1906, and what are the prospects for the joys of the life to come? Growing brighter every day, thank you. The higher we climb, the brighter the way becomes, until we can almost see the loved ones, and feel their touch and hear their voice. Blessed hope. Praise God.—W. J. Hudspeth, Hopkinsville, Ky.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Louisiana.

May 10 we began a meeting at Ruston, La., my wife directing the music and myself doing the preaching. We had one man and five women to start with. Others showed up when we went on for a few days; but there were only a few who had been members before that were heard from. However, it happened that the few we found in Ruston were of good quality. We held the meeting against a most stubborn opposition for eight weeks and three days. Result: A church of 46 members, a beautiful lot bought and paid for, which cost $700 cash, and a good subscription on a stone-cement block church, with preaching twice a month. We, in the midst of the meeting, entertained the state convention of about 100 delegates free of charge to them, without a hitch. The convention contributed $500 to the Ruston house and lot. Our Louisiana brotherhood regard the Ruston meeting as another victory for New Testament Christianity.——Wife and I begin next Wednesday night at Calhoun, La. Like Ruston, Calhoun has never had a sermon by one of our preachers. We have but one member in or about Calhoun that we know of, but I feel delighted to have the honor of joining this one member, and opening fire on the forts of sin in that town. I will preach the Gospel in Calhoun with as much force as a badly jaded man can, till the forts give way and we establish a church.—John A. Stevens.

Indian Territory Letter.

We are making some notable advances in the Indian Territory. Last week we arranged with the Chickasaw church to become a living link. Already we have engaged Bro. R. E. Rosenstein, the popular and successful minister at Bartlesville. He will evangelize throughout the Chickasaw Nation. He is ready to lend a helping hand to any small band of Disciples within his field. We hope to establish a church in every neighborhood in the Chickasaw. We ask that the brethren throughout the Chickasaw receive him kindly and co-operate with him heartily. Those wishing to secure him should write him for the present at Bartlesville, or to S. R. Hawkins, South McAlester, I. T. A good friend of our Indian Territory work, who lives in Indiana, has notified me that he is having a fine new tent made in Kansas City, and will ship it to me in a few days. He does not give us this tent, but lends it to us until he sees fit to call for it, which will not be for nearly a year, if at all.

We are planning to hold our greatest convention the last week in August. It will be held with the church in South McAlester. The C. W. B. M. convention will immediately precede that of the Indian Territory Missionary Co-operation. It will begin on Monday afternoon, August 27, and continue until noon the following day. The I. T. M. C. will begin the afternoon of Tuesday, August 28, and continue until Thursday night following. We wil have the strongest program ever presented by one of our conventions in the I. T. The location is a central one, the railroad facilities are the best afforded by the Territory, the program will be a feast of good things from end to end, the season the most opportune of the whole year, the rate of travel the lowest obtainable, and the cause paramount. All this being true, we have a right to expect a great and enthusiastic gathering. Reader, if you reside in the I. T., we want you to come and be with us in this convention, for it will do you good, and through you will bless the cause. H.

Southwest Missouri.

While this section has been receiving some of our finest workers we have been called on to lose some of our best. D. W. Moore, so long at South St. Springfield, has succeeded J. H. Mohorter at the Central, Pueblo, Colo. And now O. W. Jones, for four years at Jasper, goes to Milan, this state. In the course of time, however, we expect to kill the fatted calf as we welcome them home again.

The church at Marionville is seeking to secure J. R. Blunt, of Richland; Pierce City has eyes on R. H. Tanksley, of Neodasha, Kan., and Diamond is working hard for Jas. M. Miller, all as pastors. Our churches thus are coming to seek men instead of men seeking them. And nothing but the best will do either. These are fine young men. Brother Miller has just finished school at Kentucky University, and has many opportunities, but southwest Missouri claims him.

J. W. Baker, our tireless Jasper County evangelist, has been doing some work outside the county by urgent solicitation. At Monett he assisted Robert Simons and the church to wipe out their debt of many years standing. Pierce City, near there, then wanted him and he has just concluded a meeting there with a number of additions and money raised to employ a pastor for all the time. Joseph Gaylor, who had been supplying for them prepared the way. Now they have the "vision." Brother Baker's plan is to locate a pastor whereever he holds a meeting with a pastorless church. This is the fourth time he has succeeded. We hear that W. C. Willey, of Carl Junction, has just closed a great meeting at Waco, this county, with 50 additions.

Neosho, under the energetic leadership of F. F. Walters, is going to build a new house. The lot is already purchased.

The Webb City church has just enlarged their building with galleries ready for a meeting, with Lockhart and Garmong. Carterville, their neighbor, talks a new building.

The South Joplin church, under the leadership of Geo. L. Peters, is making steady progress. They have a fine mission Bible school in Blendville, the southwest section of Joplin, with an attendance of 50. He will hold his own meeting this September.

At the First, Joplin, we are in a campaign to increase our Bible school. J. H. Hardin, state secretary, was with us last week in an institute. We propose to have a modern school in every sense of the word. Last Sunday in the rain we organized a fine mission at Villa Heights, in the east part of the city. We will at once erect a good building seating 200 and hope to follow with a meeting and possibly organize our third church before the end of the year. J. W. Baker will oversee the work, and meantime supply for me while I take a little vacation.

The writer with V. E. Ridenour for singer will assist the Hamilton avenue church, St. Louis, next November in the simultaneous campaign. We will have our meeting here before that time. So far have had 42 additions this year at regular services. W. F. TURNER.

Indian Territory Letter.

We have just returned from a short vacation in the Indian Territory, and while there held a short meeting at Roff. There were 18 additions to the church. They had held a very successful meeting only a few months before, and had a large ingathering. The purpose of our meeting was to present a special series of doctrinal sermons setting forth our plea for a restoration of the New Testament church, and gather in, if possible, some who were not reached by the former meeting. The congregation was greatly strengthened and another harvest will be gathered in the early future.

The Roff church is one of the best in the territory. Its success so far is largely due to its faithful minister, Bro. E. S. Allhands. He is one of God's noblemen and is loved and respected by everybody in the town. It is a matter of general regret that he has decided to give up his pastorate there in the early future to re-enter the evangelistic field. This looks like a mistake on the part of both pastor and church.

We were surprised to see so many evidences of the material growth and prosperity of the country.

There are plenty of Indians yet, but they are being civilized and Christianized, and are becoming good farmers and citizens. The per cent of church members among them is about as large as it is among the white people.

Our visit and experiences there were the most pleasant and profitable.

We begin next Sunday at Converse, Mo.—Fife and Saunders, evangelists, Kansas City, Mo.

Illinois Notes.

The Davidson reunion, lasting a fortnight, was one of the summer events of Eureka. Mrs. Dr. Crawford, president of the I. C. E. A., the youngest of ten children, with her brother, W. A. Davidson, planned and carried it to successful completion. All the children are living, and were present. There were 88 descendants of father and mother, who settled near Eureka in 1831, where they raised their family, made their record and died. The relatives are widely scattered, New York and Arkansas being represented as well as other states. There were three great public days. One on the Fourth of July, when a picnic was held in the old home pasture. A sumptuous dinner was enjoyed by about 300 kindred and friends. A number of addresses were made, the opening one fittingly by Hon. Ben Davidson, of Fayetteville, Ark.; another by Frank Davidson, a Missouri state legislator. Others spoke and others sang. Another important occasion was the reception at Dr. Crawford's residence, which was beautifully decorated, where some 250 people met the Davidsons and tendered their congratulations and good wishes to the ten children, all more than three-score years old. The other and chief event was the spiritual services on the Lord's day. Prof. B. J. Radford, a life long friend, delivered a powerful sermon. The choir was chosen from the family. All Davidsons came in a body and sat together. Their father's barn was the early sanctuary to the pioneer preaching of the Gospel. So it is not surprising that the children, and children's children, to the fourth generation, should look forward as the climax of their family reunion, to this time when they should gather at the Lord's table together once more, and doubtless for the last time on earth. May it be the happy lot of every one so to live that he shall sit down in the larger family, in the "sweet by and by."

At Barnett, we had a pleasant call with William Barnett, a former trustee of Eureka College, who moved to Eureka to educate his boys. He regards this as one of the best investments that he ever made, for both his boys now are active officers in the church. Better give more attention to the boys and girls, even if we do not have quite so many hogs and horses.

The little church at Gillespie is having a hard struggle, as nearly all new churches do, in their earlier years. It is not far from St. Louis, and has been supplied by Dr. Luttenberger part of the time.

The Carlinville church is prospering under the ministry of A. L. West and his faithful wife. They have a good house, good field and good prospects. United, vigorous effort will soon make the church the leading spiritual power of the city.

T. R. Hodkinson is getting well into the work at Palmyra, where we have one of the good old churches of the state. The large audience that came to hear about Christian education showed a deep interest in one of the vital forces of the kingdom of God, the Christian college. Such evidence is not always visible. Is it still a question whether we really believe very much in the moral and spiritual culture of our young people? Do we believe much in the training and education of young men for the ministry? But we will grow into these larger enterprises, as we have already grown in missionary and benevolent work. It will some day be a great pleasure to see young men consecrating themselves to the ministry and being trained for the world's life. Palmyra gave us the McPherson boys, one our missionary in Havana, Cuba, the other preaching at Dunkirk, N. Y.

Modesto is about arranging for a minister. They have a good house and a good membership, in a good field. United effort and personal sacrifices will win a great victory for the Master here.

At Sheldon I found Fred Nichols spending the summer trying to build up the church. He will still visit the church after school opens and he returns to Eureka College. With such preaching and pastoral care as Brother Nichols can give, the church will prosper.

At Donovan J. N. Cloe has just entered the new elegant parsonage with his splendid bride, and they are already well enshrined in the hearts of the people. His work is divided among the churches at Donovan, Prairie Dell and Iroquoise, certainly field enough for his holiest ambition, and we predict prosperity to the work in his hands. At Donovan Ellis Gish preaches half time, and at Pitwood the other half. He is resting from his school studies and spending the summer with the churches for which he preaches. Not only is he looking up the spiritual interests of the churches, in visiting the people, enlarging the Sunday-schools, the Christian Endeavor Societies, and harmonizing the church forces but he is superintending the repairing of both churches of worship. Several hundred dollars will be used in this way. We are looking for a large increase in the attendance of young preachers, that have had some experience, in September. Churches without preachers in reach, would do well to write us early, so as to secure a good man. By good management, a little time, sacrifice and cooperation all churches in reach of Eureka can have good ministers.

M. G. O'Brien has just finished his first year's service at Kankakee. He has baptized about 40 people and materially improved the house of worship. The church numbers some 250 members, with an Endeavor Society of about 75 as fine young people as we have in any church. The Sunday-school has about 200 enrolled and has been a great power for good in carrying forward the church's work, as it always will, when properly managed. Kankakee is a good city and the church ought to be a great power in its moral and spiritual life, but it suffers much from removals, and being out of the territory where we are numerous, few move in.—J. G. Waggoner, Eureka, Ill.

Central Washington Letter.

The hot weather has not seriously affected church work in the Yakima Valley yet. Audiences and interest keep up well and additions are frequent.——Wapalo church, organized by the writer last January is now building and expects to be ready for dedication within three weeks. Bro. L. D. Green is leading this work and supplying for the church during the summer. He will remove to Des Moines, Ia., in the fall for the school advantages at Drake. In this connection I wish to speak of the talented children of Bro. and Sister Green. They give one of the best concerts that it has been my privilege to hear and have received highest praise from the most critical musical people of the Pacific coast cities. Our churches and societies need have no hesitancy in securing them when they go east, as they will be sure to please.——Our state work in Washington under the direction of the East and West Washington Boards of Missions show gains for the year and it is to be hoped that with the experience they have had under the new order a much larger work may be done in this year.——North Yakima church is prospering. The fund for the new building is growing satisfactorily. The church has kindly granted the pastor a three months' leave and he with his family will start east about August 8th for a rest and recreation, and to visit the "home folks."—Ellensburg church is building and the work is going forward. Another year will show all of our churches in Central Washington well housed. There is vast opportunity for securing good homes and paying investments here in the Yakima Valley and I shall be pleased to answer any inquiries from brethren who propose coming if they will enclose stamp for reply.——Why is the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST like a Yakima Valley orchard? Because it bears more and better fruit each year and leaves no bitter taste.—Morton L. Rose.

From the Old Dominion.

The Lord's work in the Old Dominion has been displaying greater vigor than usual recently. The prospects for a successful summer and fall campaign are particularly bright.——C. O. Woodward is preaching in a tabernacle seating 800 people, while the Manchester church is being enlarged. He has been having great congregations.——F. W. Berry is erecting two new church buildings this summer. One at Trix and the other near Finneywood.——The new house at Blackstone is nearing completion. It is a beauty, and a credit to the Blackstone brethren and to the cause at large.——After so long a time of planning the Petersburg brethren have the roof on their new house, and will get into it this fall. With the completion of this splendid house the Petersburg church should be self-supporting at a very early date. It is now a V. C. M. S. mission.——W. R. Jinnett has made a good beginning at Newport News.——At the very beginning of the ministry of C. N. Williams, the Sunday-school room of the Hampton church was destroyed by fire, the main auditorium was only slightly damaged.——D. S. Henkel, and Bro. Blick have recently held a meeting at a mission place in East End Newport News in which there were more than forty added. J. T. Watson and W. I. Burner added forty-seven at Chestnut Grove in Craig county. W. G. Johnston added forty-five at Level Green, and organized a congregation of fifty at Lucas Memorial. This latter congregation worships in the house erected on the Lucas homestead, near the burial place of the sainted C. S. Lucas.——Brother Adams, of Bluefield and Stephen Davis of Tazewell, added forty-five at Falls Mills.——J. S. Meadows added twenty-four at Grassy Spur.——H. D. Coffey erected a permanent tabernacle on the best lot in East Roanoke in the month of June. He is now holding the first meeting ever held by white Disciples in Floyd county. We have a colored church in the county.——Jas. P. Lichtenberger of New York, and Miss Wambaugh of Angola, Ind., are in a promising meeting with the Tazewell church.——The Piedmont assembly will be held July 29 to August 8. This is a great event among Virginia Disciples, and the present meeting promises to be as good as any of its predecessors.—H. C. Combs.

The Present Status of the Union Question and our Attitude Toward It.*

The age in which we are living may be called an age of rapid transitions. Old philosophies are being rapidly supplanted. Psychology is an entirely different study from what it was fifteen years ago. All the data of science can by no means be said to be established beyond a doubt. We are rapidly taking on and in new ideas of civil polity. The science of government is undergoing such rapid changes that the old politicians are standing aghast at the transformation. Sociology is a new science to-day. So is economics. Political economists are walking in a much brighter light than did Adam Smith a century and a quarter ago. Things that were legally right are getting to be legally wrong. Systems are nothing; truth is everything. Everything to-day must prove its right to exist by some other claim than that it has existed for some time. Ability to cope with the present and the future is the clincher. Men are willing to see the old systems crumble provided the rubbish is cleared away for better ones to arise. To certain schools of thought this seems almost sacrilegious. But it will not seem so when we comprehend the fact that it is the function of truth to establish righteousness at any cost. Truth comes with a sword and peace can not be established without its use. So Christ said: "I am not come to bring peace but a sword."

Theological systems are put to the same tests as others. Wherever error is found or wrong conditions prevail, there truth must get in its work. And in no age of the world has truth been so active and potent as in this. So rapid are its strides that we can hardly keep apace with the world's progress. Some are getting behind trying to defend their systems, trying to keep their little systems of truth and human speculations from expanding and breaking their credal boundaries to let out the human and let in the divine. But others are catching the spirit of the day and are trying to let God and truth sweep grandly on, and do not lose their faith amidst the crumbling ruins. If this is an age of doubt, it is doubt in the permanency of existing institutions and forms rather than doubt in God or Christ. Some are making the mistake of waiting to actively identify themselves with truth until it takes permanent form. But this it will not do unless it becomes crystallized, and it can not become crystallized for it is living.

The age, then, in which we are living demands conscientious thinking, candid spirits, and Christian charity; for the gravest problems of to-day are those that vitally concern the church. It seems to me that we are in one of the most important transition periods in the history of the church. The movements are rapid, the strides are long, the direction right. In all this we have a part to play, the most important in my judgment of all the religious bodies.

The one question whose solution involves the solution of all others is the question of Christian unity. We have not laid too much stress upon this vital question. And I am most profoundly convinced that there is more need to-day than at any previous time in our history, to preach Christian unity. Not church unity, for no such unity is contemplated in the New Testament.

But in our treatment of the question to-day, it is necessary to raise the congressman's question, "Where are we at?" In other words, have we made any progress in its solution? Is the Christian world where it was a hundred years ago? I answer, and you will agree with the answer, we have made progress in its solution, and the Christian world is long stages ahead of where it was a hundred years ago.

The Christian unity problem is a complex one. We know what the answer should be, or we think we do. Toward that answer we have taken some steps. Were this not the case we would have existed almost a century in vain. This none of us will admit. We have impressed ourselves most remarkably upon the Christian thought of the world, and the problem is in part solved, in fact the major part. For have we not seen a divided church, once wholly inimical to the idea of Christian unity as chimerical and undesirable, change until almost every denomination now regards it as both practicable and desirable? How has this come about? Simply by the idea inaugurated by the Campbells, and advocated by their co-workers (not followers), both contemporaries and successors, with such persistency and persuasion, that it gradually percolated through the various religious bodies so quietly and yet effectually, that it seemed to many of them that it originated with them. The idea as yet is largely in the formative period with them, and therefore looks very imperfect to us who have lived in it and grown up with it.

Now, it seems to me that the very imperfection of the idea of Christian unity as an ultimate consummation, held by our religious neighbors, demands two things of us.

1. That we continue to emphasize the scriptural conception of ultimate union, because we are in a better position than any other body to be teachers on this subject, having been drilled for nigh a century in the art of teaching it. And let me emphasize, we should approach the task with becoming humility and Christian patience, not only because we are no more intelligent than those we would teach, but also because we have had better advantages than they to comprehend the Scriptural idea, having made it the theme of special study.

2. We should hail with profound gratitude every opportunity of closer approach to those we would teach. All Christian truth held in common should be made a bond of unity in love. In the realm of honest differences the utmost deference should be shown those who do not agree with us. We should aim to supplant controversy with conference on points of difference; not that controversy does not have its merits at certain stages in any propagandism; but, that after we have gained our place among the religious forces and established our right to exist, aye more, have created a demand for the very thing that was once rejected as useless and worthless, then the time has come for conference, for in free and fraternal conference there is the best opportunity to show the merits of our ware.

Now I have said all these things to emphasize the one need of getting where we can do the most effective teaching along the line of our specialty. Where is that position? The full answer must await until I have said a few other things. But in passing let me say that I believe the time is ripe for the most effective presentation of our plea to the teachers of the other religious bodies. We have never yet been able to get at the rank and file of what some of us are pleased to call the denominations. I am convinced that the only way to reach the masses of the other churches with our plea of Christian unity is to get at them through their teachers, the ministry. For the people generally have confidence in their leaders. Denominations are not dead. They do not even seem to be dying. They continue to show an increase every year. To compass Christian unity, does it mean that we must win all these into our church fellowship, by having them come into formal fellowship with our local churches? If Christian unity can come only by this program, it will never come in my humble judgment. The program I am wont to think has been prepared by a higher power than man. God is working now as surely and irresistably as ever in the evolution of things. I am as sure that Christian unity will be acomplished as I am that Christ reigns. And I am equally sure that it will be accomplished in God's way in spite of human prejudices. The condition of denominationalism existing to-day was not contemplated in New Testament times. Therefore the steps from denominationalism to unity are not marked out in the New Testament. If they were the problem would be easy. But the condition being extra-apostolic, the program will be extra-apostolic.

E. S. Muckley.

But to guard myself at this point from being misunderstood, I want to say that the picture of the united church is distinct in the New Testament. So perfect is it that we do not want to fail to bring our religious neighbors where they can get the same clear view we have, so they may fall in love with the picture. But apart from that, all we have to help us is certain guiding principles. The distinct steps are not marked out for us. Now I insist that any step that does not compromise the Gospel, that will bring the divided church to a nearer view of the apostolic church, is a step that can be taken by our people with the confidence that God in his overruling providence is guiding it. Now, if the masses of the religious bodies can only be brought to see the perfect New Testament church through the instrumentality of their teachers, we should hail with delight any movement that will put us in closer touch with these teachers. Any assumption of pharisaical superiority will not do it. Any disposition to reject proper overtures for closer Christian fellowship will create the impression that we are not sincere in our desire for unity, and will discredit our plea not only before the Christians in other churches, but before the world as well. We would thus lose our grip and influence alike upon the church and world. The only thing necessary for us to guard is that we do not compromise our position.

While the subject of this paper does not involve a historical statement of Christian unity, showing how schisms occurred in the church, and how the idea of unity had its inception and growth, there is a philosophy of that history that is vitally connected with, and in measure explanatory of, the present status of the union question and what should be our attitude towards it. To this phase of the question I invite your most earnest attention and most conscientious consideration; for the facts I now propose to set forth and what seem to me to be the logical deductions from them, are of most vital importance in relation in this all-absorbing theme.

Denominationalism was the only and inevitable pathway by which God could lead his church out of the anti-Scriptural unity of medieval ages into the Scriptural unity for which we have been praying. The distance from unity under a pope to unity under Christ was too great for one step. The very age in which Luther lived made it impossible for him to see what we see to-day, and achieve what we are trying to achieve to-day. In the first place, he did not get into all the light himself; and second, if he had he could not have gotten the church into it. And it was but natural, in an age when the doctrines of the church were comprehended in forms of human symbols and creeds, that Luther and his followers should put in credal form the doctrines that differentiated them from Rome, out of whose bondage they had been delivered at so great a cost. Then besides, it was but natural that the author of the memorable ninety-five theses should be the dominating personality in the forming of a creed and a party, though he did not intend that his name should be the symbol of that party; and in fact, it was his hope that a new party would not be necessary. However, other new parties did spring up to correct errors and appropriate unemphasized truths. And it was unavoidable, too, that nonessentials should be made the basis of new propagandisms, because of the imperfect vision of men. So Protestantism had its attendant evils, for no other reason than that all evils can not be eradicated at once. But it likewise had its attendant good; for a divided Protestantism was infinitely preferable to a united Catholicism.

We are wont to speak of denominationalism as the state of Babel, the confusion of tongues. But was not this confusion of tongues, this scattering of the people, necessary to defeat the purposes and overthrow the ambitions of men?

I believe that God made Babel out of Rome, by the confusion of tongues in denominationalism, to break up a unity that was not in harmony with his purposes for his church, in order that he might bring about a desire for that unity that would achieve his own purposes in his own way. Not that God endorsed human weaknesses that produced denominations, or the errors that made them necessary, but that he used them in spite of these weaknesses and errors.

But from another standpoint denominationalism was a necessary concomitant of Protestantism. It resulted from the application of the fundamental principle of the reformation, the principle of religious liberty and private judgment; the very principle, the working out of which, made the restoration movement of the last century possible. If one man had the right to exercise private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture and gather about him those whose private judgment led them toward him, another had the same right, and still another and another, until men abused it as every good thing has been abused.

Still again. The very forms of state government of the reformation period, in which one or a very few held the reins of national affairs, was conducive to denominationalism. The fact that the few assumed, without being questioned, the right to guide in the affairs of state, made it easy and natural for one strong character or a few to assume the right to guide in religious affairs. And in fact, while it was the principle of private judgment that made the reformation popular as a bold and original idea, yet so timid were the masses in applying it, and so easy was it for them by habit, both in state and religious affairs, to let others do their thinking for them, that they did not question the right of their leaders to determine what the Bible taught and formulate its doctrines into creeds for them. And the very protestant spirit would produce other strong leaders who would gather their followers into parties.

I have said this much to show that denominationalism was a necessary condition of Protestantism and a result of the spirit of the times. That God was in the Protestant movement I think none of us question. The great religious bodies have been used of him for the conservation of truth. They had a right to exist. So few were the evils of divided Protestantism compared with those of united Catholicism, that they were not seen at first. But the right of yesterday becomes the wrong of to-day, through the law of progress. God used denominationalism as an expedient, not a finality. The time was to come when he would be done with it. Has that time come? We have been saying yes for nearly a hundred years. Louder and louder we have been sounding it forth, other isolated voices joining us in the cry, until well nigh the whole religious world is making it echo through the land.

*A paper read by E. S. Muckley, of Portland, before the State Ministerial Association of the Oregon State Convention at Turner, June 22.

Now what are the deductions from these facts, and what our logical attitude toward these bodies taking up the cry for unity but seeing with an imperfect vision. The work they did before our restoration movement made it possible. It can not be proven that if Alexander Campbell had lived in Luther's day he would have seen with any clearer vision than Luther did. The only safe inference is that he would not. Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, the Wesleys, sowed; he reaped. They labored; he entered into their labors and wrought more largely.

Now if these things be so, and I think no one will dissent from these statements, we can not afford to take any attitude toward the other religious bodies that would seem to ignore the great work they have done for Christianity. This is my first deduction, and one previously hinted. Second: We are bound, by the very fact that God has placed the seal of his approval upon their work despite their errors, and by the fact that we are under obligations to them for working out the Protestant idea and problem to the point where our movement was made possible, to enter into the closest possible co-operative fellowship with them consistent with loyalty to the apostolic conception of unity.

The question is: Shall we co-operate in a haphazard, accidental sort of way, or shall we enter into a methodized co-operation after a plan mutually agreed upon? To federate or not to federate, that is the question? I say federate, if we can secure a basis of federation that will not morally bind us to stay out of any community where ye feel we ought to preach the Gospel. From this on let us look at some of the objections and difficulties in the way of federation.

The objection is filed against it that it contemplates a handicap upon our people, that it is a deliberate plan conceived in the hearts of our enemies to greatly limit our freedom. To think that the great body of Christian gentlemen who gathered in New York city last November had laid awake nights concocting a scheme to entrap a million and a quarter people into an irretrievable loss of their liberty in the land of the free and the twentieth century, is too ridiculous to seriously consider were it not for the suspicion it casts upon earnest Christian men seeking a way to union. Brethren, "Love thinketh no evil," and we are a New Testament church, you know. We have no right to treat our religious neighbors with suspicion. Suspicion will not promote unity. Sow suspicion and we will reap suspicion. Sow confidence and the seed will be true to its kind.

Objection second. We can not federate, because to do so would be to recognize the denominational churches as churches of Christ. Though you will allow me to confess that it is difficult for me to see why a Methodist church that gave $1,700 for foreign missions as the Taylor Street Church of Portland did last year, is not as worthy of being called a Christian church, as is one of ours, that does not contribute a dollar for any mission in the light of the command to go into all the world. But still I am willing to waive the claim that the denominational churches are churches of Christ, and insist that we should federate with them anyhow, because we all admit that there are Christians among them. I insist that federation, which is nothing more than methodized co-operation after some mutually agreed upon plan, involves neither the endorsement nor the extenuation of that which is censurable in the creeds, names and practices of the other religious bodies. Does the fact that God used the reformers and the denominations they led, mean that he endorsed the errors they brought out of Rome and their failure to appropriate their full New Testament privileges? Not at all. If God has worked with the great religious bodies in spite of their errors in his effort to lead us away from our errors into the truth, then I, who am not infallible though I may stand in a little larger light than my neighbors, can not afford to refuse to associate in the most intimate way possible with the great bodies with whom God has worked for centuries. But you say: "To federate means to"—but hold on; it doesn't matter what federation means in some other connection. What meaning has it as applied to the closer affiliation of the parts of the divided church? Let us not have a war over words; the principle is what we are after. If the principle is right it matters little what word is the vehicle of its meaning. Nearly all the war in the church anyhow has been over terminology. Let us escape that blunder. It may be well to emphasize the fact that no federation has ever demanded exact likeness on the part of the federation bodies. A common interest was all that was ever demanded. If federation with the religious bodies meant the endorsement of their errors, I would be its deadliest enemy.

The one question is, can we work with Christian people in other religious bodies in a closer, more fraternal way? Will we ignore their approaches to us in an I-am-more-holy-than-thou air, or will we take these religious neighbors by the hand in Christian love, and work with them in a federation which is imperfect that we may help them realize the perfect union for which they are looking? By the federation plan the spirit of co-operation would be encouraged and extended by reason of the fact that a plan has been mutually agreed upon. It would result ultimately in great economy in administering the affairs of the kingdom. For churches that are essentially alike would not attempt to cover the same territory in neglected communities. Working together thus in the spirit of Christ, because of frequent conferences that would thus be made possible and necessary, would emphasize the points of agreement and lead to a strong desire to eliminate, in harmony with the truth, all differences that are keeping us from complete unity.

As I view this question, it is not so much a question as to whether we will lose by federating, as it is one of how much we will lose by not federating; for in refusing to federate we could prove neither to God nor man the sincerity of our plea for Christian unity. And God will simply allow us to crystallize our notions of how unity ought to be brought about into a narrow unwritten creed that will be more binding and demoralizing than the written creeds of our neighbors; and then we will become a disappearing brotherhood sure, as sure as truth has power to burst all creeds and lead their narrow devotees out of their narrow confines and make them disappear into the great company of unfettered souls in Christ.

Before the great naval battle of Trafalgar, Admiral Nelson called to his flag ship Captain Collingwood and Captain Hardy who had been deadly enemies, and commanded them to shake hands as he pointed to the French fleet and said: "Gentlemen, there's your enemy." Brethren, as I understand it, in the plan of federation I can shake hands with my brethren of the other religious bodies without the sacrifice of a single conviction or the compromise of a single essential position, while I see my Master pointing with pierced hands to the hosts of Satan emboldened by the fact of a divided church, and hear him say with trumpet tones: "Brethren, there's your enemy." Yes, and I can see him point to the whitening harvest fields and hear him say: "There's your harvest. Together cast in your sickles, for I have called you to labor together as brethren with me in its reaping."

would be safe to say from 1,000 to 1,200 persons have been baptized since the beginning of this work in Wythe county.

During these twenty years Brother Snow preached monthly for eleven years for the church at Bell Spring, Va., often preaching twice a day and sometimes holding protracted meetings. He was also pastor of the church at Bristol, Tenn., for some time and had appointments from time to time in the counties of Pulaski, Bland, Tazewell, Floyd, Patrick and Henry in Virginia, and occasional calls to North Carolina and Tennessee. For this work he was content to have his expenses paid, which was not always done, however.

After the loss of his sight he ceased to travel but continued to preach for the Wythe county congregations until he removed to Washington, D. C., in 1884. Here he often preached for us and his life for over twenty years among us has been a holy benediction. Seventy years and over a Christian; nearly three score and ten, a preacher of the Gospel; for a score of years groping in physical night, he has grown and grown, and ripened and ripened, and his path, as the path of the just, has been brighter and brighter until it has come to the perfect day. Thursday, July 18, our aged and sightless pilgrim reached the city that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God, and opened his eyes to behold the God whom he served and the Savior who redeemed him. He has preached great sermons in these later years. Sermons on trust, on patience, on godliness. As he has grown in years he has grown in spiritual-mindedness, in trustfulness, in gentleness and loving kindness, in largeness and clearness of vision, in all the gifts and graces of the Spirit of God. A priceless heritage he has left to the church and to his loved ones in his long and useful life and lofty Christian character. "Mark the perfect man and behold the upright for the end of that man is peace."

APPLEGATE.

James Stinson Applegate was born in Trumbull county, Ohio, September 12, 1826. He became a Christian in early life, uniting with the Hubbard, O., Christian Church. After his removal to Iowa he became one of the charter members and a deacon of the Scotch Grove Christian Church, organized by E. T. C. Bennett; later he was connected with the church at Monticello, Ia. He was married October 5, 1848, to Elizabeth Scofield. To this union were born seven children, all of whom survive him. The wife was called home December 26, 1901. He died Friday morning, July 13, 1906, full of years and full of faith and good works. The funeral service was conducted by J. P. Martindale, an old friend of the family.

C. S. APPLEGATE.

CREASON.

Bro. J. Gant Creason, pastor of the Christian Church in Lathrop, Mo., died at the home of his brother, Goodwin Creason, in this city, July 17, 1906, after a long illness. He was buried in the Lathrop cemetery, July 18, the writer, assisted by Rev. Foster, pastor of the Methodist Church, conducting the services.

Brother Creason was born in Audrain county, Mo., November 15, 1869. He was educated in Kentucky University and Bible College, and in the Missouri State University. He had preached about eight years. His later pastorates were at Cowgill, Mo.; Norman, Okla.; Cleburne, Texas, and Lathrop, Mo. Everywhere he was loved and honored, and his ministry was fruitful for the churches he served.

About the close of the first year of his pastorate at Lathrop, in January last, he was taken with typhid fever, and from about February 1 was confined to his bed. Pleurisy and pneumonia followed, with other complications, and for months he lay battling for life, aided by faithful physicians and friends. He was brought to his brother's home in Kansas City a few weeks before his death, in the hope that he might be helped by the change. That hope was vain. He departed in great peace, leaving sweet messages of cheer for his sorrowing family, and devoted church.

And never was there a more faithful and affectionate congregation than the Lathrop church proved to be. During the six months of his illness, they paid him his salary in full every week, furnished a trained nurse when needed, and supplied the home with many of the necessities of life, from their fields and gardens. The crowded church, universal weeping and innumerable words of love and sympathy on the day of the funeral testified to the love they bore for their pastor and his family, and to the genuine Christian spirit of the church as well. God will bless this people for their kindness to his faithful servant. Brother Creason left a wife and three children, mother, two brothers and two sisters, to mourn his loss. His brief ministry was blessed to the good of many souls, and his death brought its benediction to all who knew him.

Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

SINS OF THE TONGUE.—1 Pet. 3:10.

The crowning infamy of the tongue is blasphemy, and by this is meant profanity, and all speech that impairs men's faith in God or that in anywise detracts from his influence over the lives and hopes of men and his glory in the world.

They consist in evasion of responsibility, vid. Adam and Eve, Gen. 3:12, 13; half truths, vid. Gen. 20:2-7; deception, vid. Gen. 27:1-36; false promises, vid. Ex. 8:8, and the story of other plagues; insincerity, vid. 1 Sam. 24:8-22, and 26:1-5; lying, Acts 5:1-11; misrepresentation, Acts 24:1-8.

Flattery may not be the greatest sin of the tongue, but it is one of the commonest and most debasing. It is hard to tell which is most victimized—the one on its throne or the fawner at its base. There may be thrift in fawning but there is debasement. Honest praise for real merit is commendable, but to degrade ourselves by insincere expressions of approval or praise is an abdication of real manhood and womanhood.

"Words are things of little cost,
Quickly spoken, quickly lost;
We forget them, but they stand
Witnesses at God's right hand,
And their testimony bear,
For us or against us there.

"Oh, how oft our words have been
Idle words and words of sin;
Words of anger, scorn and pride,
Or desire our thoughts to hide;
Envious tales, or strife unkind,
Leaving bitter thoughts behind!"

One may soon forget the impatient word spoken as he hastens to his morning task, but in the heart of wife or child it may rankle all day and more painfully than if a brutal driver had lashed them with a heavy whip. We would have risked our lives to protect them from the ruffian, but love ourselves too much to make the sacrifice involved in so controlling ourselves as to leave a gentle instead of a turbulent word for our farewell.

Deception—mendacity is one of the commonest sins of the tongue. This is often practiced where we should least expect it—in the death chamber. We approach one already unconsciously embarking for that bourne whence no traveler returneth and say "Why, how well you look, how greatly you have improved!" when we are conscious that the lilies in their faces are more pallid and their forms are frailer. To no purpose we have diverted their thoughts from God when they should be thinking of little else. We have chained their attention to earth that should be riveted upon the gates of pearl. We have deceived them and wronged ourselves.

The tongue of the soothsayer often involves its owner in blood guiltiness. If one should say to the pleasure party drifting down the river, "I know there are no rapids below, sing joyfully and without concern," ought not a measure of responsibility devolve on him when amid shrieks of horror they are fatally engulfed in the waiting cataract? Who, then, can compute the guilt of those who say to our youth, "Go on in your thoughtlessness. The judgment is a priestly fable, hell is an exploded myth, the present is supreme." In equal peril, too, are those who teach that the mercy of God makes unnecessary any reparation or contrition for our wrong doing or minimize the heinousness or fatality of sin.

THE PARABLE OF THE TWO SONS.—Luke 15:11-32.

Memory Verses: 17, 18.

Golden Text.—Return unto me and I will return unto you.—Mat. 3:7.

This lesson would have been better named, "The parable of the Father and Son." The chief point of it is the relation of the father to his wandering boy rather than the relation between the prodigal and his elder brother. The latter element, however, is not lacking. The Pharisees were grumbling because Jesus associated with sinners. (Luke 15:1.) To silence them, Jesus spoke three parables—sometimes called the "three parables of grace"—showing how lost things are sought and how they are appreciated when found. The contrast between the two brothers shows that a wayward and despised wanderer may be more worthy of consideration than a selfish, sullen and respectable saint.

In studying parables it must be borne in mind that no one parable can be made the vehicle for the conveyance of all truth, not even the whole truth about one subject. It is usually an illustration of some one great principle. This group of parables will illustrate this. The occasion for them, as already stated, was the Pharisees' criticism of Jesus for his friendly attitude to sinners. His defense was that the divine grace reaches out to sinners, that they are capable of restoration, and consequently that good men ought to be friendly and helpful to them.

The lost sheep, the lost coin and the lost son all illustrate this splendid principle—the very corner stone of all religion. But as to how the return of the lost is effected, one might draw very different theories from the different parables. The lost coin was wholly passive. It was lost through no fault of its own; it must patiently remain lost until a power above itself seized it and brought it back. This is a Calvinistic parable. The lost sheep strayed through its own wilfulness or carelessness and perhaps even resisted the grace which sought to save it, but it was saved in spite of itself. Hyper-Calvinism here. The prodigal son went away from home by the free act of his own will, and he came back by his own free act. The father awaited his return but did nothing to expedite it. With no need of "enabling grace," the prodigal came back when his own experiences taught him the wisdom and propriety of so doing. This can be cited in support of Armenianism.

But the fact is that the parables support neither Calvinism nor Armenianism, because they were not designed to show just how sinful man gets back to God, but only the great fact of the universal love of God and the salvability of man.

These are the great truths which Jesus seemed always most anxious to impress upon his followers and hearers: that man is worth saving, that he can be saved, that God wants to save him, that the true and natural relation between God and man is so intimate that it is no exaggeration to speak of them as father and son, and that the present sinful condition of any man is not a destruction of this relationship but only a sad interruption of its enjoyment.

Without pressing the details of the parable too far, note the significance of the following expressions in the parable: "Give me the portion of goods that falleth to me." This was a presumptous demand. The boy had no claims yet to his father's estate. Sin begins with a demand for a kind and degree of liberty to which one has no right.

"Wasted his substance." Sin is wastefulness. It is a misuse of resources, a foolish squandering of powers designed for higher uses. "He went and joined himself to a citizen of that country." The rejection of the easy ties of sonship and the demand for utter freedom from all constraint ends in slavery of the most degrading type.

"He came to himself." The sinner is abnormal. He is beside himself. His first need is to come to his true self. People often think of religion as something abnormal, a departure from the natural life of man. It is a return to true and sane and complete manhood.

"My son was lost and is found." The sinner is still a son. He has abandoned the privileges of sonship, but in the fact that he is still a son lies the ground of his worth and of the possibility of his return.

"Return, return! Why any longer linger?
There are sandals for your feet,
And a ring to deck your finger.
Your Father reconciled
With loving heart will you behold.
In his arms he will enfold you;
Come back, come back, my child."

Would that the marriage guest presumptuously entering the palace without the wedding garment, though speechless, might deliver a message that would save us all from condemnation to the outer darkness with its weeping and gnashing of teeth. Before the King we all shall stand. If unprepared, no other fate awaits us. O why will men forever die!

In the parable of the two servants, we may easily read our censure if not our doom. We have all appealed to God to forgive our transgression against him and he has done so, but when a frail mortal has trespassed against us in kind but only to an infinitesimally small degree we mercilessly insist on the "pound of flesh." Let us remember that only as we forgive are we forgiven.

The parable of the lost sheep is a marvelously realistic portrayal of the Good Shepherd himself. As under shepherds let us emulate his example and seek for the lost till we find them. There is still joy among the angels when we restore the lost and wounded, and in finding them we assure ourselves of joy when we also appear pear among the angels.

Jesus does not mean he is speaking to the multitudes in an incomprehensible manner to punish them for their grossly materialistic lives; but simply states that as a result of this gross materialism what he says is to them as a speaking in parables beyond their powers of comprehension. Had they been more spiritually minded, they would have understood all the significance of the spoken word. As our thoughts become purified and the eyes of our faith become brighter through holy living new meaning is constantly breaking forth from the written word so that what was formerly "parable" becomes plain command, promise, or exhortation.

The "Prodigal Son" will remain the world's favorite parable as long as so many of us are alienated by sin from our Father's house and, out in the far country, are longing for forgiveness and home. Sin may not geographically separate us from sacred places, but it does place a chasm between us and peace that only divine love can bridge. Fear not. Christ would not represent an earthly father as being more forgiving than his own Father. The parable teaches that when we come to ourselves and return to our Father's house there await us a welcome, forgiveness, the robe and ring and great joy.

No other preacher in literature is a more eloquent exponent of the grace of pure, uncalculating, philanthrophy than the good Samaritan. Racial prejudice, intense as it becomes in the Orient, personal danger, great as it was between Jerusalem and Jericho, nor anything else could overcome his love of fellow man or hinder his helping an unfortunate. This love exalted him sublimely above priest and Levite. The garb is an outward sign of what ought to be within, but the hand in the heart is proof of one's belonging to the true nobility of earth and sky. This good Samaritan has saved the name from odium. Such chivalry on our part will atone for serious errors of doctrines and help redeem a loveless past.

People's Forum

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

"I would like to have your opinion," says one, "as to whether it is right to raise money for church purposes by giving picnics, suppers, entertainments, etc."

There is no specific Bible prohibition of money raising for church purposes by picnics, suppers or entertainments. But it would require a freak of the imagination to picture the men of the early church—men like Peter and Paul—urging the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus to sell tickets for a musical and literary entertainment for the benefit of any church organization. Those clear headed leaders would have known, as the wise leaders of to-day know with profound conviction, that the buying of a ticket to an entertainment is not giving to the church. Any plan that offers a substitute for genuine giving sets a lower standard for God's people than a plan which leads to giving without any thought of return to the giver. And just so far as it is wrong to replace a high standard with a lower, at least so far it is wrong to replace free giving with a mercantile transaction in which a buyer, who is falsely supposed to be a giver, gets a good percentage of earthly return for his money. Not only is this fact becoming more and more apparent to the Christian of to-day, but he is learning that, from the standpoint of economy of time and strength, as compared with the result in money, an organized effort to secure actual giving is far more profitable than the ofttimes desperate struggle to make an entertainment "pay." Men and women and children ought to be asked to give. It is good for them to be asked, and better yet for them to give when they are asked, and to do so with no thought of what they will get for their money. F. E. Mallory.

About Conventions and Resolutions.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

I have never been in sympathy with the idea that these gatherings should not make pronouncement on the great social and religious movements of the day; and even political movements when moral questions are involved. Such a position is unworthy of us. We are here. We can't help being here; and would not help it if we could. World movements are here too. We can't help them being here. What are we as a religious body (and it is hoped an aggressive and sane and spirit-filled body) to do? Take to the woods when brought face to face with world movements that involve the interests of the kingdom of God? I should regret to think that the brotherhood had not brains and heart enough to make a ringing pronouncement on any of the great questions of the day. Why should we not have the manhood to stand up and be counted? The world knows where to find the great religious bodies on the great movements of the time; why should we be forever and forever a nonentity? Brethren, when there is anything "doing" in the moral and religious world I want to stand up and be counted; and I want the church in which my life is wrapped up to stand up and be counted. It is folly for a great and aggressive body to be in the world and not take part in the issues that are abroad. Let us have forever done with a provincialism that is too timid to meet world movements face to face and bear its share of the world's work. If I mistake not the temper of our people is such that they are not willing longer to be held back by outgrown traditions and unreasonable timidities.

The Panama Conference.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Permit me to say just a word on your editorial on "The Rio Janeiro Conference," or one phase of it—your reference to the "Panama Congress" of 1826. Let me say first, though, that the "Current Events" editorials are uniformly interesting, sane and true to fact, and it is not in the spirit of fault-finding that I refer to the above topic, but simply to make a correction in your historical facts concerning the old "Panama Congress," thinking you would welcome such correction.

This is what you say: "* * * the Panama Congress which was held during John Quincy Adams' administration in 1826, and was attended by Henry Clay, then secretary of state."

Now, as a matter of fact, Henry Clay did not attend that congress, nor was he to attend it; nor did any one from the United States attend it. The United States senate wrestled long and hard with the question of accepting the invitation to send representatives—this when the president sent the names of Richard C. Anderson, John Sergeant as representatives, and William B. Rochester as secretary, but finally confirmed the president's nominations. The delegation was then delayed because of the opposition in the house to making the necessary appropriations to defray the expenses of the representatives. It was not until late in April of that year that the necessary appropriations were finally passed, and later still, in the summer, that our delegates started for Panama. Mr. Anderson sickened and died on the way and Sergeant and his secretary reached Panama, only to find that the congress had adjourned to convene again later at Tocubaya, Mexico. This later meeting never took place, owing to domestic disturbances among some of the republics. Sergeant was compelled to return therefore without having accomplished anything. See Annals of Congress and Journals of Senate for 1826; McMaster's History of the People of the United States, vol. v, pp. 440-59.

Its chapters are on "Beginning Right;" "The Open Confession of Christ;" "Assurance of Salvation;" "Receiving the Holy Spirit;" "Looking Unto Jesus;" "Church Membership;" "Bible Study;" "Difficulties in the Bible;" "Prayer;" "Working for Christ;" "Foreign Missions;" "Companions;" "Amusements;" "Persecution," and "Guidance." The work is written in the devout style characteristic of Dr. Torrey, and will be found helpful to young converts in seeking to grow in the Christian life.

RAISING THE AVERAGE, by Don O. Shelton. New York, Chicago, Toronto, Fleming H. Revell Co.

This small volume is dedicated to Francis E. Clark, founder of Christian Endeavor and two of the chapters appeared formerly in the "Christian Endeavor World." The author's well written chapters serve to emphasize the value of raising the average days of our life to the standard of our highest by holding steadily before us our highest ideals, and being satisfied with nothing less than doing our best. It can hardly fail to prove stimulating to any believer who wishes to make the most of his life.

THE UNIVERSAL KINSHIP, by J. Howard Moore, instructor in Zoology, Crane Manual Training High School, Chicago. Chicago, Chas. H. Kerr & Co., 1906.

The thesis of the author of this book is that man is kin to all that is beneath him, having developed to what he is, body, soul and spirit, conscience, sympathy and affection, from an original protoplasm. There are no doubt a great many scientific facts mentioned in this volume, and the author's contention that mankind should have a greater regard for all the lower forms of life is an entirely worthy plea, and one with which we find ourselves in sympathy. But the amazing feature of the book is, that one whose mind has been trained to scientific habits of thought, can overlook the most stupendous and significant facts in human life and character, or assign such facts to causes wholly inadequate. In the author's effort to exalt animal life he feels it necessary to degrade man, and to make him merely the product of a clod who is to return again to the dust to be no more. Of a great creative cause that lies behind all the wonderful phenomena which he describes, and through these is carrying forward a sublime purpose in creation, developing man for a glorious destiny, the author knows nothing and says nothing. And yet the pathetic thing about the work is that the author is conscious of no defect in this scientific creed! He readily believes that "the creeds and ideals men bow down to to-day will in time to come pass away, and new creeds and ideals will claim their allegiance," but he confidently expects "the time will come when the sentiments of these pages will not be hailed by two or three, and ridiculed or ignored by the rest; they will represent public opinion and law." This scientific creed, then, has reached a finality and is perfect! Alas, for human frailty and the limitations of a mind trained only in methods of materialistic science!

There's Nothing Lost.

BY LYNN R. HORNISH.

There's nothing in the universe that's lost.
The bread that's on the water tossed,
Returns again.

The love, that can not be expressed,
Remains to bless the lover's breast;
It does not die.

The hopes, that budded but to fade,
Deep, in the shadows of the glade,
Spring up again.

The laurels, that we did not gain,
The fall, the sorrow and the shame,
Have their reward.

Beauty, expression's subtle grace,
Though vanished from the once fair face,
Still charms in memory.

Wisdom, again to childhood grown
Prattling in language once its own,
Finds joy in old folklore.

Ambition, that to zenith rose,
Humbled and prostrate, finds repose;
Humility has its reward.

And so we may assume of all;
Success and failure, rise and fall,
Each has its recompense.

For, in the hollow of His hand,
Sifted and filtered by Time's sand,
They're held for good alway.

PART III.

CHAPTER V.

In bygone years, the end of the vast apartment in which Raymund and Rhoda stood, had been partitioned off from the rest to form the ladies' waiting room. Indeed, there had been several very large rooms; separate ones for the ladies, the gentlemen, and the emigrants, besides the many-mirrored dining room. All these were now thrown into one long chamber, and it was so thronged from one end to the other that Raymund thought it most unlikely that Boggs, even if he should glance through one of the street doors, could see them. He and Rhoda went to the extreme end, where the broad staircase leads up to a more exclusive waiting room. The young people did not know whither the steps led, and perhaps it was well enough, for later in the evening a heavy board was placed across the balustrades bearing the words, "Closed for the night." Although Rhoda was living in continual fear of discovering Mrs. Van Estry's face in the throng, and although it seemed not improbable that the young man who had so terrified her might suddenly appear, still, the moving crowd possessed a fascination that deadened her alarm. It was interesting to see streams come pouring out at the cry of the floor-walker; it was interesting to note the different faces, the strange baggage, the family groups eating lunches out of pasteboard boxes, the dogs, birds and even cats, borne in captivity. It was like free moving pictures. The snorting of freight-engines reverberated from the car shed—those engines which have not the polished hissing and clear brisk ring of passenger engines, but are harsh and rasping, as if they had not been brought up in the best society. It was thrilling to hear the crier call the names of cities that to the young people's minds were surrounded by a sort of mythical mist, such as Boston and New York and San Francisco and Denver and Seattle and New Orleans. And it was like hearing of passing acquaintances to listen to the call of Council Bluffs, Quincy, Springfield, Memphis, Little Rock, Chattanooga, Peoria, and Ottawa. But when they heard Moberly, Sedalia, Mexico and St. Louis, they felt like rising and exclaiming, "These we know. They are our old friends."

At first they had been unable to find two vacant seats together, so Rhoda had taken one and Raymund had stood by her, waiting for the departure of the fleshy lady who sat next to her with four valises about her feet and a bird cage in her ample lap. The fleshy lady was anxious for her train to come, and, with no faith in the clock, stopped every official that came within hail, to ask how long it would be now?" But the children were almost as anxious for her train to come, and when it did, Raymund had her seat. They made a strikingly picturesque little scene, the little bundle on Rhoda's knee, and the green umbrella in Raymund's hand, their eyes blue and interested, and very alert for the always possible Mr. Boggs, or Mrs. Van Estry, and their hair gleaming duskily silver in the shadow of the high back of their bench. Every uniformed man that passed stopped to ask them, "And where are you going?"

When they answered, "Crawley," the response came invariably, "Six-thirty." After the day forces had been relieved by the night officials, each of the new-comers paused to say, "And where are you going?" And being told, they answered, "Six-thirty;" so there could be no doubt about it. When the clock showed the way from ten to eleven, the atmosphere of the Union Station changed; it was no longer pre-eminently practical, rushed, heedless. The lunch-counter began to show empty stools, the arrivals found family groups waiting to receive them, there were affectionate greetings; more and more the element of romance permeated the scene. There was something like adventure in getting off the trains so late, and eyes sparkled brighter than by day. At twelve, the trains did not come in so often, and at one, the faces that entered the glass doors began to look tired and even wan, and some of them even cross. At two, the business seemed over. There were perhaps fifty in the vast chamber, the men at the remote end smoking cigars, and a few mothers slowly walking from one wall to the other, leading a hopelessly awake young child.

At last Raymund pounced upon an empty rocking chair that had not ceased to vibrate from its occupant, and Rhoda was installed in it. Raymund tried to take a nap on the bench at her side, but the iron arm-rests that portioned off the bench were much in the way. He tried curling up like a cat with his nose between his knees; he tried lying across the arm-rest in the vain hope that its sharp edges might be softened by unconsciousness; he tried dangling his legs over the side and bowing out, his back to fit the bench-back, but his head—there was no place to put his head! The girls had all gone from the lunch counters and when an engineer came in at three for a cup of coffee—the coffee that was always smoking in the beautiful polished tanks, the man who "ran the stand" had to be roused from heavy sleep—he had stretched himself out upon one of his counters. The lights at the bookstand had all been turned off that the proprietor might then better sleep among his books, and the baggage room just beyond the men smoking their cigars, was closed.

Sometimes Raymund would start out of a minute's sleep, feeling that one of his limbs was being cut off by an executioner, and he would see Rhoda peacefully sleeping in her rocking-chair. What a face of peace and purity! Raymund's heart leaped high in brotherly pride. The street cars had stopped, but there was still life in the saloons across the street. That business never came to an end. Four o'clock, and rusty snores sounded from the benches where men slept in spite of the iron arm-rests. Long ago the black woman with her mop had sent a flood of water under the benches, making the miserable travelers move to another part of the room. Long before that, men had rolled huge tin cans about the floor, gathering up loose paper and discarded bones of fried chicken and unbuttered scraps of baker's bread. No longer the lusty-lunged crier shouted names of geographical interest, but slipped from bench to bench, giving a gentle shake and muttering some destination in a gutteral half-whisper. Between his minutes of sleep, Raymund stared at his sister, glad that she was his sister and grateful that she at least could sleep, and drowsily wondering if Boggs would try to stop them before they could get on the Crawley train. Sometimes his thoughts would even extend to the length of "And what if you do get to Crawley? What do you think you can do in Crawley? There's no work there for you!" But even this could not keep him awake.

It was nearly five when the station awoke to the duties of the day. Out from the yards came the first passenger train, but it was still a long time before Six-thirty. Early twilight came quickly. The electric lights were turned out and a cool dusk stole over the reddish brown floor. Raymund rose stiffly. Rhoda was still sleeping. The youth placed his umbrella in his seat in lieu of a reserve ticket, and walked to one of the doors and looked out upon the car tracks. High in the iron roof a glass globed electric arc still sent out its spangled rays, and directly under it was Boggs. Raymund for a moment wondered if the villain had been standing there all night, or if he had just come to see that Rhoda did not escape on the Crawley train; and if the latter were true, why he had come so long before train-time, and why he did not come into the waiting room and pounce upon his intended victim. Coupled with this vague wonder was the idea that perhaps Boggs did not know of their presence or intentions, and was there on some secret business that had no connection with them. All this was deadened, indistinct, unemotional. But, of a sudden, Raymund, as it were, woke up. He came to the fearful danger of the situation. It mattered not why Boggs was there. He was there, and they could not go to Crawley—at least not this morning; but it was possible that they might escape their enemy.

The youth darted to Rhoda's side and drew her to her feet before she was half-awake. "Has the train come?" she asked, bewildered, as she grabbed for the little bundle.

"We must run for our lives," said Raymund, seizing her arm. She was wide awake now, and hurried by his side without a question. When they were in the street, Raymund said briefly, "I saw Boggs on the platform." The hack drivers stared at them curiously as they crossed over to the saloons. They almost ran past the little bookstores where the impure books in the display-booths—those beggars of the literary world—seemed to implore the passers-by for charity. They crossed the bridge over which heavy vans were already beginning to lumber, and with hardly a glimpse for the river rolling away in mist, and with no thought of the long lines of freight cars groaning beneath their feet, they sped into the advancing day. Was Boggs following? Was Mrs. Van Estry waiting at the next corner to cry, "Stop thief!" Were the police on their track? Whither turn? Whither direct their way?

"We must not go back to Mrs. Bannerton's," Rhoda panted, "or to the orphan home. We mustn't go where I have ever been seen. Let's hunt out a little hotel somewhere and stay till the afternoon train for Crawley, and try it again."

"But Boggs will be waiting," said Raymund fearfully.

"Yes," said Rhoda in despair, "Oh! what shall we do? If I had any friends in this city—anybody who had known us for years we could go to them. But we are just orphans, Raymund, and nobody is sure of us, nobody really knows us or cares about us. If Mrs. Van Estry has me taken to the police-station, there wouldn't be anybody to contradict her witnesses. Even at the orphan home they could only say that while I have been there, I haven't done anything wrong, as far as they know. And Mrs. Bannerton is really a stranger to us. But even if they didn't send me to jail, just to be taken to the police-courts, and maybe locked up till my case could be heard, would kill me! Raymund, you are my protector," cried Rhoda wildly "and you must take care of your poor Rose!"

"And I will!" cried Raymund stoutly, though in truth he was at his wits' end. They hastily turned a corner and almost ran into a short, spare man with a dry, wrinkled face, though it was not an old face; a stubbly beard ran unevenly over the chin and lean cheeks. The man was in his shirt sleeves, and the part of his lower figure was clothed in a very tight pair of blue cotton trowsers. He started back to avoid the collision, and looking up sharply from under the glazed tip of his cap, said, "Which it is Rhoda and Raymund!"

"O Wizzen!" they cried out in a breath.

"Father Does It."

Behold the one clear gage of the boy's endeavor—what father does. Mothers' clubs may make motions divine in wisdom and in goodness; mothers' congresses may form all elements of virtue into laws; mothers individually in the home may talk, work, struggle, to make their sons models by which to shape a new heaven and a new earth. But the boy's world is in the man who is his father, and the boy believes that, whatever may be right on Sundays or at prayer time, the things that are really good, that really count in life, are what father does. Moreover, it is what father does which defines the means with which the boy shall work, the sphere wherein his efforts shall be shaped. In a word, what father does is the beginning as it is the end of the boy's achievements. This is not a menace, either, to the mother's higher aims or to the boy's best endeavor. It is simply one of the rather neglected facts of human experience.—Harper's Bazar.

The Bestest Time.

I'll tell you what's the very best
  Of all the things I know;
It's when I get a dreffful cold,
  So ma says, "You can't go
Outdoors a-tall, ner off t' school;
  You stay 'ith me to-day."
'Nen she looks around and says,
  "Less see, what shall we play?"

"Injuns," I yell, good and loud,
  'Cause Injuns' mostest fun;
"Dear me, no," says ma, "if we play that I won't get nothin' done."
"I'll be a great big nefelent,
  An' you're jest awful 'fraid."
"All right," says ma, "you rant an' roar
  Till I get my cookies made."

An' when she gets her work all done,
  An' we get tired o' play,
She pulls her chair up to th' fire,
  An' holds me, this-a-way.
Most times she says 'at I'm too big,
  She won't hold me a-tall,
But when I'm sick she says 'at I'm
  Her baby, after all.

'Nen she gives me hoarhoun' drops,
  M-m, hoarhoun's goodes' stuff!
An' lemonade, all nice an' hot,
  Till I'm just ful enuff.
'Nen she lays me on th' lounge,
  An' tucks her shawl aroun',
An' pats me till, firs' thing I know,
  I'm sleepin' jes's soun'.

Two Thorns.

It hurt. Every minute it seemed to hurt worse—worser, Elizabeth said. She kept uncrumpling her palm and looking at it, and touching it to make sure it hurt very much—and groaning softly under her breath. There was nobody in the world Elizabeth pitied so much as Elizabeth, for probably there wasn't any other little girl with a cruel thorn in her hand.

Mademoiselle looked sorry, but Elizabeth would not look at Mademoiselle. You don't look at folks that keep you a whole hour away from your play to learn your spelling all over again, or that say: "What, what!" at you when you say your three table. Folks like that you—'spise.

"Gov'enesses are dreadful folks," sighed Elizabeth. "I wish my mother'd let me go to school instead of having me governed." But she could not wish anything very long, except that the thorn would come out of her hand. It certainly did ache worser than ever—there now, didn't it! Hadn't she pinched it to see, and didn't it?

"Elizabeth"—the voice was quite gentle, but firm. Elizabeth did not turn round. Her little white forehead above the tan-line was wrinkled with real pain.

"There is still the spelling"—

As if she could learn her spelling with a thorn in her hand! But she opened the book again and whispered "A-ch-e—a-ch-e" over and over to herself.

Why! Why! That was what she was doing now, this minute—a-ch-e-ing! Elizabeth laughed softly, in spite of herself. After that the word was easy enough to spell. Elizabeth was eight; but as long as she lived, even when she was eighty, she would know how to spell a-ch-e.

Some one was talking to Mademoiselle at the door.

"No," Mademoiselle was sighing, "I can not yet come." Some words Elizabeth lost there, then, "She is my little—what you call?—thorn in the flesh."

Elizabeth sat up straighter. The speller slid to the floor.

It was rather a startling idea. She's got one in her flesh, too, and it's—me!"

"She means me," she thought. It had never been clear like that before—what her naughtiness was like to Mademoiselle. How much it must hurt if it was like a thorn in her hand! It must burn and sting and ache-a-ch-e. How much it must a-ch-e!

Elizabeth found herself beginning to be sorry for Mademoiselle on account of that thorn. If some one would take it out! Nobody in the world could take it out except Elizabeth. And Elizabeth—she turned suddenly and ran to Mademoiselle.

"I'll take it out!" laughed Elizabeth, softly. "I've got one in my hand, too, an' I know how it hurts. I never s'posed be-before that thorns and—and bad little girls hurt just alike. I can spell a-ch-e now, an' my tables. Don't you think it will come out of your flesh then?"

Mademoiselle understood. With a little cry she caught Elizabeth up and kissed her. Then as gently as she could she uncrumpled the little aching hand and drew out Elizabeth's thorn. They were both laughing when it was over, so Mademoiselle's thorn must have come out, too.—Annie Hamilton Donnell, in "Zion's Herald."

Our Funnies.

He—"You've got to have a pull to get ahead."

She—"Yes, and you've got to have a head to get a pull."

"You are an hour late this morning, Sam."

"Yes, sah; I know it, sah."

"Well, what excuse have you?"

"I was kicked by a mule on my way here, sah."

"That ought not to have detained you an hour, Sam."

"Well, you see, it wouldn't if he'd only kicked me in dis direction, but he kicked me the other way!"

"When we were poor," remarked the prosperous man, reflectively, "we looked forward to the time when we could have a summer home."

"Well?"

"Well, when we got rich enough to have one we didn't like going to the same place every summer, because it was monotonous, and we looked forward to the time when we could have another variety."

"Well?"

"Well, we got another, and then we began to long for a winter place, so that we wouldn't have to be so much in the big house in the city."

"Well?"

"Well, we've got them all now."

"And are you happy?"

"I suppose so. At least, I suppose my wife is. She keeps them all shut up and spends most of her time in Europe, but she knows she has them."

The Sin of Omission.

BY MARGARET SANGSTER.

'Tis not only the thing you do, dear,
  It's the thing you've left undone,
Which gives you a bit of heartache,
  At the setting of the sun.
The tender word forgotten,
  The letter you did not write,
The flower you might have sent, dear,
  Are your haunting ghosts to-night.

The stone you might have lifted
  Out of a brother's way,
The bit of heartsome counsel
  You were hurried too much to say;
The loving touch of the hand, dear,
  The gentle and winsome tone
That you had no time nor thought for,
  With troubles enough of your own.

The little acts of kindness,
  So easily out of mind;
These chances to be angels
  Which every mortal finds—
They come in light and silence—
  Each chill, reproachful wrath,
When hope is faint and flagging,
  And a blight has dropped on faith.

For life is all too short, dear,
  And sorrow is all too great,
To suffer our slow compassion
  That tarries until too late;
And it's not the thing you do, dear,
  It's the thing you leave undone,
Which gives you the bit of heartache
  At the setting of the sun.

Eternity, Where Shall I Spend It?

BY DR. R. A. TORREY.

Many years ago, when the elder Forbes Winslow was living—the most eminent pathologist in diseases of the mind that England ever produced—there came over from France a young Frenchman. He brought letters of recommendation from many eminent men in France, among them one from Napoleon III., at that time Emperor of France. Dr. Winslow read the letters, and said:

"What is your trouble?"

He said: "I don't know."

"Have you lost money?"

"No, not lately."

"Have you suffered in honor or reputation?"

"No, not so far as I know."

"Have you lost friends?"

"No, not recently."

"Then what keeps you awake?"

"Well, my trouble is I am an infidel, and my father was an infidel before me. But strangely enough, every night when I lie down to sleep this question rises before me. 'Eternity, and where shall I spend it?' During the night I can think of but that one thing, and I can't sleep."

Dr. Winslow said: "I can't help you, but I can tell you a physician that can." He took his Bible from a table, and turned to Isaiah liii. 5, and read: "He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and by his stripes we are healed." There was a curl of scorn upon the Frenchman's lip. He said:

"Dr. Winslow, do you mean to tell me that a man in your eminent scientific position believes that effete superstition of Christianity?"

"Yes," said Dr. Forbes Winslow, "I believe in Jesus Christ, and I believe in the Bible; and believing in Christ and the Bible has saved me from becoming what you are."

The man dropped his head for a moment. The he said:

"If I am an honest man I ought at least to be willing to consider it, ought I not? Will you teach me?"

Dr. Winslow consented, and the physician of the mind became the physician of the soul. He showed the young man from the Bible the way of darkness into light. In three or four days his doubts were all gone, and he went back to France with his mind at rest, for he had settled the question of "Eternity, and where shall I spend it?" He would spend it with Christ, in glory.

"Eternity, and where shall I spend it?" Thank God I know where I shall spend eternity. Do you?—Exchange.

Our rubber baptismal suits are the best made, and we sell them lower than the advertised prices of other houses for the same grade.

"The Garrison Library" is attractive enough in itself, to wit: Alone with God, 75 cents; Heavenward Way, 75 cents; Half-Hour Studies at the Cross, 75 cents; Helps to Faith, $1.00; The Holy Spirit, $1.00, and The Christian-Evangelist, $1.50, all prepaid, for $5.00. But during the summer we shall give as a premium an excellent 11x12½-inch picture of the author.

This is an excellent time to buy Christmas books. Read our list of special offerings on page 991. If ordered now, we will hold till Christmas-gift time and mail as directed. It means a saving of 50, 75 and even 100 per cent.

We are always pleased to submit our Bible school literature to committees for comparison with supplies sent out by other publishers. When the verdict is based on merit the order invariably comes to us to send the W. W. Dowling series.

The Christian-Evangelist special over the Wabash gives our friends the privilege of a lake ride from Detroit to Buffalo. A staunch steamer has been secured that will make "a night on the deep" safe as in a Pullman. A multitude of our readers may earn free transportation while rendering the church a helpful ministry. Write us for the plan.

By Courtesy of the "Wabash" that draws "The Christian-Evangelist Special" to the Buffalo Convention, October 12-18.

Evidently the conviction is everywhere prevailing that The Christian-Evangelist is the truest exponent of the doctrines and aspirations of the "fathers" of this Restoration, that it best represents and expresses the real genius of our movement toward Christian unity and the extension of primitive Christianity throughout the earth, and that in conjunction with the preaching of the word it is the greatest force among us for enlisting men in the Lord's army and making better soldiers even of the veterans. Recall the long lists of new subscriptions published in each of many past issues. In addition to new ones received by one's and two's last week we note these clubs: Madison, N. C., 3; Hamilton, Ill., 18, W. H. Waggoner, pastor; Carthage, Ill., 35, J. M. Elam, minister; Dallas, Ill., 7, C. L. McKim, minister; Monmouth, Ill., 61, D. E. Hughes, pastor; Rayerton, Ind., 3, H. D. Lawrence, evangelist; Atchison, Kan., 3, W. T. Hilton, pastor; Fayettesville, Ark., 3, N. M. Ragland, minister; East St. Louis, Ill., 11, W. H. Jones, minister.

REGIMENTAL REUNIONS AND FORTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY BATTLE CHICKAMAUGA,

CHATTANOOGA, SEPTEMBER 18-20, 1906.

On September 18, 1906, will occur the forty-third anniversary of the Battle of Chickamauga. It is proposed to celebrate this memorable event with a reunion of the various regiments that participated in this memorable battle and the various battles fought around Chattanooga. This reunion will be held at Chickamauga National Park, September 18, 19 and 20, and the present indications are that it will be the largest and most notabe gathering ever held in the South. On the above dates, the remnants from the armies of twelve states, comprising the following: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Kentucky, will assemble, many for the first and last time since they marched from its blood-stained fields, forty-three years ago.

Here is one of the great opportunities for the education of the youth. Don't fail to take your children and show them historic Chattanooga, with all its historical connections. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Go and see the old war generals and other officers point out the places of interest on the battlefield; let them show you and explain, in person, the markers erected on the battlefield showing the positions of the opposing armies at the time of battle. It will not be long until none will be left to do this noble work.

It will be many years, if ever again, that such an opportunity will present itself. See that your tickets read via the Louisville & Nashville R. R., the Battlefield Route. Call on your nearest railroad agent for rates and advertising matter pertaining to the reunion, or write nearest representative of the Louisville & Nashville R. R.

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
  Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
  The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
  For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
  Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
  And the song of victory.

1809 CENTENNIAL PROPAGANDA CHURCHES OF CHRIST 1909

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

None of the many able advocates who have appeared in this forum has come to the very heart of the matter better than does Brother Macfarlane in the following article. "Pittsburg and Pentecost" may not be truly alliterative, but if we attain unto the spirit of this article, they will be terms prophetically, historically and most intimately associated. Let us adopt "practizo" as one of our slogans. Let us rely on doing more than others as the chief proof of our being more nearly theologically correct than others. Let us make our adornment of the doctrines of the Lord Jesus through lives of peculiar usefulness and holiness one of the irresistible appeals to men to surge into the kingdom, bringing with them all they have and are, before Centennial.

Conscious that it is without thought of personal interest, we follow Brother Macfarlane's article with testimonials of appreciation many wish to express for The Christian-Evangelist. Years of travel and observation have made known to us that it is closely read by those preachers who are baptizing converts and leading the masses onward and upward; that it is found in most all of the homes that are as springs refreshing our great church enterprises and commending the true faith to their neighbors, and that its sentiments largely prevail in those churches that are redeeming this world. All who have had experience will testify there is little financial profit in publishing a religious paper, but to be of large helpfulness to the brotherhood is a rich reward, and this privilege all can share who will help us to place this inspirational journal in 100,000 homes before Centennial. The sooner this is done, the more glorious will be Pittsburg's Pentecostal and the greater the spiritual reward of our co-laborers. This attempt for 100,000 Christian-Evangelists by 1909 is a truly altruistic enterprise. Let us all lend a hand and immediately.

Centennial Goals and Preaching Aims.

BY P. C. MACFARLANE.

Good preaching will per se abound in good teaching, but it will not rest there. Its mark is beyond. The sublime aim of preaching is not to teach what a good life is, but to persuade men to live the good life. A sermon is not a sermon when it is theological only; it must be biological and ontological and spiritually pomological. The true preacher sways by the power of his own life as well as by his words. The true prophet and his message are one. Why did Jesus write not? Because he wrote always. His life was his message. It is good to be sound in preaching; it is equally good to be sound in living. Some sound preaching sounds hollow.

Again, it is good to be right about the way into the Kingdom, and we preach it with unfailing insistency, but our greater need just now is preaching on the way within the Kingdom. If a better plea does not produce better character, wherein is it better? A keen critic has said of us that our preaching is almost wholly soteriological. This is hardly just, I think. Our aim may be soteriological, but our end is surely sociological which is Christological. Saved! but for what? Service! The ultimate test of salvation is not a form but a service. Certain are upon the left at the judgment day not because they are uncircumcised, but because they are unchristianized; not because they are goats, but because they are not sheep. The test of a man's salvation is the service he renders; and yet this is no doctrine of salvation by works. He works because he is saved; and is not saved because he works.

Why does not the religious world hearken with more humility to our plea? In part because of pride and sectarianism; but in part also because the badge of superior character is the only badge of authority for the Christian. When we have to debate to prove our apostolicity our apostleship is vain. When one comes asking, 'Art thou he that should come or look we for another?' It is better to be able to answer 'Go tell the things which ye see and hear.' The next four years is a good time for less debating and more demonstrating; less talk about baptizo and more thought about practizo. (Sic.)

Let every preacher aim to double his spiritual power and that of his church. Let the elders resolve to double their graces and the manifestations thereof. Let the deacons minister twice as faithfully. Let the teachers prepare their lessons twice as carefully and thrice as prayerfully. And let every worker and every humblest member be twice as loyal, and the Centennial campaign will close with such an outpouring of the Spirit as will remind Pittsburg of Pentecost.

I often wonder if our evangelism does not put the vehicle before the motive power. It is not the voice of Jesus uplifted in preaching or prayer, but the body of him uplifted on the cross, that draws men to him. It is the life and not the letter, the love and not the law, the vim and not the voice of Jesus that gives him power over the hearts of men. It is not a legend but a life that moulds character and appeals to the affections of the race. The mightiest demonstration of the truths of the gospel and the integrity of Jesus and the authority of his person is not contained in syllogisms or wrought out in theologies, nor forged in dogmas nor boomed out in ecclesiastical gunnery. It is in a body of loyal believers in Jesus Christ, no matter how ignorant or humble or poor or uncouth or obscure, whose souls are on fire with the love of God and whose daily walk shows them to have been with Jesus. The sarcasms of an infidel, the shafts of the destructive critic, the thunderbolts of logic and the chilling snow-balls of agnosticism, dash themselves in vain against such breastworks of faith as this.

We wish to be evangelical. True Christianity is excessively evangelical. "Go ye," is the first article of its creed. Query: Would we be more evangelical if we were less so? Would we not divert more people from sin if we converted more nominal Christians to real Christian living? If we made it harder to get in and more worth while to be in? If we talked less about the blessedness of life over there and revealed more of the blessedness of life over here? Quacks advertise; good physicians are sought after. When I look at the quantity of Christians in my town I am puffed up; when I look at the quality of them I feel like Sheba's Queen the day after.

And yet, mind you, I am hurrying along with the rest of the pack in full cry after numbers. I agonize to make converts. I draw the net as eagerly as any. I rejoice when it is full to bursting; I mourn when it is empty. And yet, I cannot help thinking that the surest way to get converts is to make what we have better. The world has a notion we are trying to get it into the church; some people who are not pessimists have a notion we have got a good bit of the world into the church. Perhaps if we should covet numbers less and turn to and multiply our graces and rejoice in them, the world would pause to look and turn to follow. To the infirm of Bethesda Jesus said, "Wouldst thou be made whole?" He never spent a moment urging himself upon any. He stands and knocks but he never tries a door. He caused many men to hesitate upon the threshold; he never dragged one over.

To consider as I have above may seem to some to consider very curiously; I may even grant as much; yet, nevertheless, I record my solemn conviction that to double our numbers in four years is a trivial aim, but to double the sway of Christ over the hearts and lives of our brotherhood is a mark worthy the blood of a hundred thousand martyrs.

Rather than aim to be twice as large numerically, let us aim to be twice as large charismatically, and it will follow as the light the dark that our statisticians will not grow stale with idleness.

Centennial Propaganda.

I always hope to have such a worthy Christian paper as The Christian-Evangelist in my home.—W. S. Fuqua, Hannibal, Mo.

I shall do all I can for The Christian-Evangelist, and hope to be able to send you quite a number of subscribers. I am wonderfully pleased with it. It easily distances any other paper among us. Am sending it to my brother, who is a Methodist minister.—H. L. Walthan, Bloomingdale, Mich.

Current Events

Congressional Campaign.

The recent adjournment of Congress turned loose upon the defenseless public a large number of congressmen, most of whom at once hurried home to their respective districts. This dissemination of the lawmakers among the general mass of the public really does no harm to the public and is an excellent thing for the lawmakers. It enables them to correct their notions as to what movements the people really have at heart and what issues will be vital in the coming congressional campaign. For example, we think most of the Republican members will find that the "stand-pat" proposition is not one which will arouse the enthusiasm of the voters in most districts. Some of these days something will have to be done about the tariff. There are two methods of evading that issue and they have been used alternately about as long as they will last. One is to admit that revision is needed but to argue that the present is not an auspicious moment to undertake it. The other is the standpatters' demand to let well enough alone. Both are temporizing attitudes toward an urgent question. The less said about standing pat, the better it will be for Republican success.

Governor Cummins, of Iowa, has been renominated after a brisk contest in the state convention. Iowa Republicans stand by their "idea" and its chief spokesman as against stand-patism.

Standing on the Record.

Speaker Cannon, in being interviewed the other day about the issues of the campaign, said: "What can the Republican party do but stand on its records?" That is much better. In fact, that is about all any party or anybody can do in soliciting an expression of public confidence. Especially is this true of the party in power when it asks continuance in office. The record of the Republican party so far during the present Congress has been pretty good—thanks chiefly to constant urging from the White House. Many abuses have been uncovered and with some of them Congress has grappled. The most popular word in the political vocabulary just now is "Reform." Almost everybody admits that Roosevelt is a reformer. But does his spirit extend to his party in Congress and elsewhere, to such an extent that the party can safely be trusted as the exponent and practitioner of reform? Or is it that the party has been dragged by the heels into a program of reform for which it has no liking and from which it has not been able to escape on account of the popularity and vigor of the executive, but from which it will escape at the first opportunity? As to the Democratic party, most people would admit that it represents the spirit and impulse of reform (as opposition parties usually do), but reform must not end in impulse. Has the party the ability and discretion to do constructive reformatory work? These are the questions which we must answer for ourselves. The Republican party in Congress can show achievements in reform, but one is tempted to suspect that it had no great heart in them. The Democratic party's heart is in the right place, but it has no recent achievements, to exhibit in token of its ability. We must take our choice.

Russia's troubles multiply. To financial embarrassment, civil strife and the crash of falling cabinets, is added the menace of a concerted mutiny (now apparently a failure) in the Baltic fortresses. The douma is gone but the doom remains impending over the empire. It is saved from overturning only by its vast mass and the sheer force of political gravity which holds great and inert masses in their place.

Newspaper Juries.

A Philadelphia judge has asserted the proposition that the proper agency for investigating abuses in government, including misconduct of public officials, is not the grand jury but the newspaper. The newspaper is an institution having a large force of men who are trained to find out everything that is interesting or important, and complete liberty to tell everything it finds out. The newspaper has a continuity, and therefore a degree of efficiency, which the grand jury can not have. It also has facilities for bringing the facts which it may discover to the attention of the proper responsible authorities and of the people themselves. There is a good deal of truth in all this. The ideal newspaper not only has the power of diagnosing the ills of the body politic, but also has facilities for administering the publicity cure in the most effective way. If the people govern in this country—and there is a tradition to the effect that they do—then a general notification regarding any discovered abuse ought to be the proper step toward remedying it. One is reminded of the familiar saying of a great American statesman that he would rather live in a country with newspapers and no government than in one with a government and no newspapers. But this high definition of the function of the newspaper holds good only of the impartial and independent newspaper. The "organ" has but little governmental utility. So long as partisanship obtains in the majority of newspaper offices it will be necessary at least to supplement their efforts by other instruments of justice which are less seriously complicated with personal and political considerations.

Slow Music.

Slower music will be used when the veterans of the G. A. R. march in parade at their annual encampment at Minneapolis this month. Commander-in-Chief Tanner has issued a circular ordering that the time of the music shall be reduced from 120 to 90 beats to the minute. The latter figure indicates the tempo of the music to which the armies of the civil war marched, and it was fast enough to bring them to victory. The quicker step of these modern days is too fatiguing for the veterans. Give them slower music. The army thins as it advances. The spirit is still blythe and brave but the feet are faltering. Many are dropping by the roadside while their comrades march on a little farther. For thousands who were in line last year the slowest music is now too fast. They have fought their fight. They have almost finished their course. Let there be slow music.

The race of the "Robert E. Lee" and the "Natchez" from New Orleans to St. Louis is famous in the annals of the old Mississippi steamboat traffic. The pilot of the victorious "Lee" in that race, Capt. J. W. Connor, died last week. It was thirty-six years ago that the great race occurred.

Standard Oil.

Mr. Rockefeller returned from Europe last week. His welcome was not as warm as that which Mr. Bryan will receive at the end of this month. Still his arrival was not unobserved. There were officers ready to serve papers on him to secure his appearance in Ohio courts to answer charges which are pending against the Standard Oil Company. He has promised to appear. Several Standard Oil men have been cited to appear before the grand jury, but Mr. Rockefeller has not been called. It is feared that if he is required to give testimony against the company, and incidentally against himself, before the grand jury, he might be able to claim immunity when later proceedings are instituted. The war on Standard Oil is to be carried on with vigor. The octopus may yet find some way of escape through the jungle of technicalities, but it will have the fight of its life. Meanwhile, there is ground to wonder whether cheap alcohol, made possible by the recently passed free alcohol bill, will not furnish a way of escape from bondage to the oil trust. Great things are claimed for alcohol as a fuel, and nobody can monopolize it unless he can control all the potatoes, corn (both grain and stalks), beets and most of the other farm products raised in this country.

At the primary election held in Illinois August 4, Shelby M. Cullom, the man who looks like Lincoln, defeated former Governor Yates for the United States Senate by a very decisive majority. This will make Senator Cullom's fifth term. In 50 years of political life he has never been defeated.

Our National Conventions and Our History.

If one should attempt to write a history of the Disciples of Christ as a distinct religious movement, leaving out the historic events which have transpired in connection with our conventions and all the interests and enterprises which have originated in them, it would make a very lean and barren historical narrative. Our national conventions have been the highest expression of the life, aims, and aspirations of our religious movement. They have been the Mount Pisgahs from which we have caught glimpses of the Promised Land before us. They have been the Mount Hermons from whose glowing summits we have caught visions of the transfigured Christ, and have heard again his great command to disciple the nations. Every national enterprise among us which has given us character and standing, as a religious force in Christendom, has had its origin in and been nourished by, our national conventions. There has always been among us, as there has always been in every religious movement in Christendom, certain divisive influences at work, but the greatest unifying human agency among us has been our national conventions.

It is because of such considerations as these that we should guard jealously the function and freedom of our national conventions, and resist any tendency to diminish their power and influence for good. There remains much to be done to make them more effective instruments for carrying out the aspirations and aims of the brotherhood. As we have already pointed out in a previous article, they should be made more representative in character, and should be brought into more vital touch with the churches, as their agents for carrying forward their work and giving expression to their sentiments in a spirit and manner perfectly in accord with the genius and aim of our movement.

And then, in the arrangement of the programs of these conventions, in giving each interest its proper place, and in providing for the free discussion of all questions relating to the welfare of the cause, the greatest care and consideration are necessary. The freer and more democratic these conventions can be made, and the closer they can be brought to the churches and to the individual delegates from the churches, the more effectively will they serve their purpose and be a worthy instrument of carrying out the purposes of the brotherhood. Nothing wuld be more surely destructive of the influence and value of these conventions than the feeling, on the part of the people generally, that they were managed by a few men whose decisions and plans the convention is expected to approve without discussion. We are sure that no such desire or purpose exists on the part of any of our leaders, but it is important to avoid any semblance of such method of conducting our conventions. The welfare of the church, no less than of the state and of the nation, depends on freedom of discussion in which all stand upon an equal platform having equal rights with perfect freedom to express their individual convictions.

There is no more interesting and inspiring spectacle in the life of a free church than a great deliberative body, marked by order and parliamentary decorum, facing some great and living issue of the times in free, fraternal and dignified discussion. There is no better test of the real Christian culture of a people than their ability to conduct such a discussion in a manner worthy of Christianity and of the great interests at stake. One man presents one aspect of a great question, clearly, cogently and courteously. Another rises and presents a still different view of the same theme, or it may be tests the relevancy or bearing of some argument presented. Still another sees and emphasizes the common truth underlying these differences, and when all have spoken the whole convention has a wider, clearer and more symmetrical view of the question at issue than it could possibly have had without such discussion.

To carry out these ends in our national conventions due prominence should be given to the hours for devotional service, and they should be made seasons of preparation for the tasks of the convention. Most of our conventions fail here. The devotional hour comes at a time when most of the delegates have not arrived at the place of meeting, and on account of the pressure of business only a few moments are devoted to waiting on the Lord, seeking wisdom and strength from him to do his work. We can not cherish too highly nor guard too jealously the place and the value of our national conventions in the promotion of the common aims and enterprises of the brotherhood.

A Timely Sermon.

We take great pleasure in reprinting from the "British Weekly" the sermon found elsewhere on "The Unity of Christians," by Dr. Alexander Whyte. Its spirit and sentiment seem to us exceedingly timely just now for our own people. If any of our readers should miss a careful perusal of this sermon they will be the losers for such omission.

Notice, first of all, in the letter preceding the sermon, the four statements or truths which these distinguished leaders of the various religious forces in England assert that "all Christians can make their own." Note what vast progress that indicates in religious sentiment on the subject of Christian union. If the Christian leaders of this country have reached, with equal unanimity, these same conclusions—and we believe most of them have—then indeed we who have made the plea for union our specialty have reason to thank God and take courage.

The most vital and timely part of the sermon itself, in our judgment, is that which relates to the fitness of any man, or of any religious people, to advocate Christian unity. "Before the apostle will permit any man, leader or led, to open a mouth or to take up a pen concerning the reunion of Christians, he first demands of that man whether he himself is a truly Christian man or no; whether he himself is truly united to Christ or no; whether or no he has himself received any consolation from Christ amid the disunions of his own soul and amid the alienations and the enmities of his own life."

These statements try us like fire. It is only the calloused mind and heart that does not realize their incisiveness. They strike at the very heart and center of the whole problem. Many of us of late have felt this very thing to be true, but we have not said it perhaps in the same forceful and cogent way. After a careful reading and re-reading of this sermon we felt like kneeling in the presence of God and saying, "Lord, who am I that I should be an advocate of that deeper spiritual life, which is involved in Christian unity? Is my own spirit sufficiently imbued with Thy spirit, to enable me to lead others in the path of closer union and fellowship with Thee? Have I the humility and meekness of spirit, the disinterested zeal for the kingdom of God, to enable me to speak for Thee in behalf of unity?" That such will be the effect of the reading of this sermon on thousands of others of our readers we cannot doubt. The danger is that many of us will think and say that this applies to Brother So and So, and forget to apply it to ourselves. We have made a personal application of this lesson to our own heart, and we advise all our readers to do the same.

Perhaps none of us have ever realized, as we should have done, what great honor and responsibility God has placed upon us in permitting us to be advocates of Christian union. We have not been sufficiently humbled by it, and have not been made to feel our unworthiness for so holy a task. If recent experiences shall serve to humble us all, and make us feel our unfitness for the task that God has laid upon us, and shall lead us to such severe and honest self-examination and self-criticism, as will result in a better preparation for this great work, then God's purpose in such experiences will, no doubt, be realized. God teaches us by our failures no less than by our successes.

Nothing can be plainer than that the spirit which Dr. Whyte describes as the preparation for leadership in Christian union, is the very spirit in which this great problem must be approached. In so far as we have gone about it in any spirit of strife or vain glory, with the knowledge that puffs up rather than with the love that edifies, we have been in error, and we can not too soon correct that error. Christian union belongs to the holy of holies in Christianity. It lies at the heart of things, not on the surface. It belongs to the deeper and profounder things of the kingdom of God. No one can wisely lead in such a matter who has not himself known something of the deeper life with God, and whose soul has not been cleansed from all pride of opinion and obstinacy of spirit, and self-sufficiency and uncharitableness, and has been clothed with humility as with a garment. Our prayer to God for this whole brotherhood of Disciples who have rendered such heroic service in behalf of Christian unity in spite of our own imperfections is that we all may come into such vital union with the Lord Jesus, and be so filled with his spirit that we may be worthy advocates of the holy cause of Christian unity.

Notes and Comments.

Dr. Henry A. Stimson tells in the New York "Observer" of a conversation he had with Dr. R. S. Storrs, the famous Brooklyn pastor, just before his death. Dr. Stimson had referred to the many churches in Brooklyn which owed their origin to him. The great preacher and pastor replied: "They succeeded because my best men went into them. I would never give encouragement to any new movement unless my best people living in that neighborhood would join it." That is the kind of unselfishness which only a great-hearted, broad-minded man can feel. Sometimes, of course, it is unwise to organize a new church in a given community, but if it is determined by those interested that a church is needed there, then the mother church and its pastor should be willing to give up such of its members as would be necessary to make it a success.

A part of our centennial task as originally outlined, it must be remembered, is the building of centennial memorial churches and the paying off of old church debts. In the building of new churches special attention should be given to the most approved forms of church architecture. The new conception of church work, and especially the new prominence given to the Sunday-school idea, must find embodiment in our church architecture. Church buildings ought to be architecturally graceful and beautiful, and they must be adapted to the work of the church or they are practically useless. We hope soon to give special attention to this subject in a special issue of The Christian-Evangelist.

It is hard to overcome a popular misconception. Brother Yeuell reports that in his New England meeting he found the preachers had the idea pretty well fixed in their minds that the Disciples of Christ are baptismal regenerationists! It is not necessary to suppose any special depravity underlying this misconception since we have learned how easy it is for us to misunderstand and utterly misrepresent each other on matters much less complicated than this. The lesson which this fact imposes upon the representatives of our reformatory movement is special care in guarding against any such misconception and in taking pains to remove it where it exists. That preacher who leaves in any community the impression he thinks that Christianity or the kingdom of God consists mainly in the proper observance of ordinances has certainly been at fault in his method of preaching. Christianity is pre-eminently a spiritual religion, and the inwardness of Christ's teaching is what distinguishes him chiefly from all other religious teachers.

Wm. H. Cord, principal Hazel Green Academy at Hazel Green, Ky., describes a situation in a mountain mining town in that state of twelve hundred people, where there are groups of Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Catholics, Northern and Southern Methodists, Missionary and Hard-shell Baptists, and several Christians or Disciples of Christ. They meet in a union church, each of the four leading bodies occupying one Lord's day in each month. The Sunday-school is made up of representatives from all these churches, both in its teaching force and constituency. Brother Cord asks how we would apply the principle of federation to a situation like that. The principle of federation is already being applied in that town. It is only a question of how much further, if any, they can apply it. If, for instance, they could all meet together each Lord's day and the ministers alternate in preaching, that would, perhaps, be an advance on what they are now doing. If they are not already co-operating in efforts looking to the moral welfare of the people of the town, they could do that. If they could see their way clear to hold union evangelistic services by mutual concessions that would sacrifice no principle, they should also do that. In a word, the principle of federation would require that they work together just so far as they can do so, freely and conscientiously, for the promotion of the kingdom of God in that town, each respecting the conscientious convictions of others, and all remaining true to their own convictions.

An Urgent Call.

The total expenses of the Yeuell meeting at Manchester, N. H., were $1,142.23. I am in receipt of vouchers in the form of receipted bills, for all these expenses save balance due the evangelist for personal expenses and salary. On closing the meeting he wired for $250 to meet outstanding bills, which I authorized to be sent to him at once, though there were only $62 on hand. The total amount contributed for this fund up to date is $713.75, leaving a deficit of $428.48. Brother Yeuell, who needed rest very much, was about to start to Bethany Beach for a two weeks' rest when he was suddenly called to England by the precarious condition of his mother's health. He sailed at once for that country, asking that balance due him be sent to an address which he furnishes in London, at once. He will be compelled to have it. I have, therefore, acting for my brethren, authorized that the balance due him be sent as directed. Besides the labor and expense of a wide and protracted correspondence, including several telegrams, I will freely contribute $50 of this deficit, and I earnestly solicit that the remaining amount, $378.48, be contributed at once.

The meeting has been productive of wide and far-reaching results. It will result in a church in Manchester devoted to the principles of this Reformation, besides a broad-casting of the seeds of religious reformation throughout that region. It will prove to be a wise investment. May I trust to my brethren to contribute promptly the funds necessary to liquidate this indebtedness?

Current Religious Thought.

"The Standard" (Baptist) may not fully realize that Christian unity is the suppressed song in its heart, but playing variations on its "interdenominational comity" it will one day strike the sweeter note of absolute oneness in Christ and never vary far from it again. In an able editorial advocacy of united effort by Protestants to secure better support for superannuated ministers, it thus voices its sense of the need of a closer walk with all the children of the King:

> We are emphasizing these days the value of practical co-operation among religious bodies and hence have reason to feel that a better fraternal spirit exists than once was known while a better service is done for humanity. [Here follows an account of William Quayles' proposal to raise a fund of millions for ministers age has mustered out of service, such as the Carnegie Fund for school teachers.] Some method should be devised commensurate with the material needs in the case as well as with the equity of it. While men to-day are giving vast fortunes for educational and philanthropic work, the proposal would seem to be not only timely but fruitfully suggestive. If Protestant denominations could only get together long enough to see the wisdom and the justifiable character of such a movement it would not be long before some men of wealth inaugurated the movement and the denominations endorsed it by practical co-operation. Such a movement certainly could not make a less efficient ministry; it would unquestionably produce stronger and happier men in the ministry and help to solve one of the problems of the church.

This editorial on a Restatement of Doctrines in last week's St. Louis "Christian Advocate" would be quite depressing did we not believe our friend Editor Palmore is in error. We believe the changes referred to are due to a change in the sentiments of Methodists rather than the changing significance of words:

> There seems in some quarters to be a mistaken idea regarding the purpose had in mind by members of the general conference in the appointment of a committee to prepare a restatement of Methodist faith. Some of the secular papers seem to be of the opinion that the Methodists have fallen behind the times and have learned that they must keep up. Nothing could be further from the truth. The fundamental principles of Methodism have not changed. Methodistic faith in its cardinalities is now what it always has been. But words have changed in significance; in the popular understanding, many do not now mean what they did a century or a century and a half ago, and to accommodate the Methodistic faith to the comprehension of all hearers, the conference proposed to present it in such a form as to render it more intelligible to the men of to-day. The faith of Methodism is founded on Biblical doctrine and teaching as interpreted by Wesley and his co-laborers and the purpose of the revision of restatement is no more than to present in the language of to-day the fundamental truths on which Methodism is founded.

Editor's Easy Chair.

PENTWATER MUSINGS.

Last evening as we sat upon the western veranda watching through the branches of the hemlocks the red sun sinking to rest beneath the waves, it was observed that the crimson path over the lake ran directly to each of the observers. This, said the Easy Chair, is a parable. Yon glowing orb of day stands for the Sun of Righteousness who is the effulgence, the outshining of God. Each one sees this divine effulgence of God for himself, and no two, perhaps, see it exactly alike. But to each believing soul who looks steadfastly on him who is the light of the world, he sends forth his beams of light which make a shining pathway of duty reaching from God to each believing heart. What does God require of any man but to walk in the light as he is able to see the light? Why should we quarrel with each other because we chance to see the light from a different angle of vision? For after all the chief trouble with all of us is not so much in the lack of sufficient light as in our failure to walk in the light we have. As we gazed at that crimson pathway that lay across the lake, far out to the setting sun, there came to us that comforting passage: "The path of the just groweth brighter unto the perfect day." To him who uses the light he has, God giveth more light until his pathway, once dim and uncertain, widens and brightens into a shining highway. And so all nature is a parable teaching us the ways of God with men, when we come to understand it. This material universe is but the outward investiture of him whose Spirit fills all worlds and all time, even that measureless time, which we call eternity. This is why it is that "The heavens declare the glory of God,

And the firmament showeth his handiwork."

Perhaps more people are seeking rest during this month of August than in any other month of the year. It is not simply rest from either physical or mental toil which men seek when they leave their homes in the summer season for some quiet nook far from the city's maddening crowd. It is the rest that comes from change of scenery and occupation and therefore a change of thought and method of living. Often there is an indefinable longing of soul for a deeper rest underlying this habit of leaving the shop, the office, and the counting room for a season to get closer to the heart of nature. So much is man a unit and so intimately are the different parts of his nature blended that it is often difficult to know where this longing for rest takes on a religious quality. When David wrote: "Oh, that I had wings like a dove, then I would fly away and be at rest," he was thinking, no doubt, of something higher and deeper than absence of the cares of state and the responsibilities of kingship. A celebrated picture exhibited once in the Royal Academy represented King David seated upon the broad, flat roof of his palace surrounded by the symbols of his high office, but wearing a careworn expression on his face, his brow furrowed with lines of care and his eyes looking away from the glitter and pomp of his royal surroundings and gazing into the infinite space, where, in a storm-swept sky, care-free and buoyant several white winged doves were flying. This was the artist's comment on the passage we have quoted above. Sooner or later the soul learns the lesson perceived by Augustine long ago—that our souls come from God and are restless until they rest in him.

The noise and confusion incident to building are not conducive to quiet reading, but we have read four or five books thus far—scientific, religious and theological—and these in connection with our regular literary work, and the preparation of a volume for the press has been quite sufficient to keep us busy. It was during one of our summer vacations that we prepared the volume of sermons by Alexander Proctor for publication. This was a labor of love which we greatly enjoyed, although there was a great deal of labor in it. We loved Alexander Proctor and admired his genius, and to seek to put some of his noble thoughts into permanent literary form was a real pleasure. The book has had a good sale but there are thousands of our ministers who would be greatly quickened intellectually and spiritually by coming in contact with the inspiring thoughts of these sermons. There ought to have been a volume of sermons from George W. Longan. Each of these great men richly deserves a well written biography. We do not believe the State of Missouri has produced two nobler types of manhood, nor two abler preachers of the Gospel, than Alexander Procter and George W. Longan. To have enjoyed their love and confidence during their lifetime is an inspiration to us even yet. It was their misfortune, if it may be called such, to live somewhat in advance of their own time and to apprehend certain great truths and principles which even yet are hidden to many of their brethren. But time will vindicate the general correctness of their view, and some day, let us hope, some biographer of our great men will do justice to the memory of these great Missouri preachers who lived and wrought nobly and have passed on to the higher and holier fellowships and activities of the life unseen. To us earth is poorer since they left it and heaven is richer for their going thither.

On the north veranda of "The Pioneer" two thrifty young oaks were standing just in a line east and west, and instead of cutting them down we built the veranda around them and they are just the right distance apart to swing a hammock between them. In this hammock the Easy Chair is located this morning facing the lake which lies before us in broad ribbons of green and purple and orange. Now some readers will think that is a luxurious position, even for an Easy Chair. And so it is, but we are sure none of our readers will begrudge a toilsome editor an occasional moment of luxurious repose amid such surroundings. Of course, there are people, on the other hand, who would smile at the idea of anything so primitive as that we have described being luxurious. But that is all a matter of taste. The Easy Chair prefers it to a king's palace with all its luxurious appointments. With Pastor Wagner we believe in the "Simple Life," and that is what we are trying to live here in these Michigan woods by the lake shore. Let Newport and Atlantic City and other popular, fashionable seaside resorts frolic and carouse and put on society airs if they wish. But as for us give us the society of the trees, the music of the waves, and for a canopy the over-arching blue of the heavens, and for perfumes the odors of the pine and the hemlock, and quiet to think of God and duty and destiny, and we will be content. So many people prefer this kind of a resort that the problem before us just now is to prepare for their accommodation. The steamer "Kansas," which arrived this morning from Chicago, brought a dozen souls seeking rest here upon this beach. Some of these will have to lodge in the village of Pentwater for the present. That is a cool and delightful spot for people coming from the south and west. By another season we hope to have more ample accommodations, both in the way of cottages and increased hotel facilities, on this beach.

The Buffalo convention is little more than two months away. Great interest should attach to this annual convocation of our hosts. For the first time in our history our national convention enters the Empire State. It will reach a number of people who have never before had the opportunity of attending one of our national conventions. We meet in one of the great and beautiful cities of that state where a national convention of such dimensions as ours can not fail to attract wide attention. Special effort should be made for a good attendance but more particularly, as we have before urged, for a representative attendance of appointed delegates for the transaction of the important business which comes before these annual conventions. It is an exceedingly interesting time in our own history when our movement is aggressive, hopeful and moving on toward its centennial celebration which is near at hand. Every public utterance in that convention should be carefully considered and every set address should be the subject of earnest prayer as well as of earnest study. Let us make it a great convention in the high ideals we shall place before ourselves, in the spirit of consecration and of unity which shall mark every session, and in the large plans we may devise for advancing Christ's kingdom in the world. We are sure many eager eyes will be turned toward that convention to see what shall be its great keynotes and key-words for the coming campaign. In all our plans for the convention, let us not forget to ask and to plan for the Lord Jesus to be with us and guide our deliberations to his own glory.

By F. D. Power

There is a world of art in Rome beside the Vatican treasures. The Capitol Museum, for example, has a fine collection of statuary. The Capitol is the smallest, but historically the most important of Rome's hills. The great temple of Jupiter was here, the most sacred shrine of ancient Rome. In the center of the piazza before the museum is an admirable statue of Marcus Aurelius on horseback in bronze. It would be a fine model for the men that build the innumerable equestrian statues for our city of Washington. Owing to its moderate height the head is distinctly visible while our multitudinous bronze soldiers are so high as to be almost indistinguishable. In the museum are some wonderful works. Here is the world-famed Dying Gladiator, found at Rome in the sixteenth century. The dying warrior, recognized as a Gaul by his twisted collar, short hair and mustache, is sitting on his shield while the blood pours from his wounded breast. He has evidently inflicted the blow himself, having previously broken the crooked horn which lies on his shield. He prefers death to captivity. It is a great figure cut in a masterful way. Read Childe Harold, Canto 4:140. Another interesting figure is the Satyr of Praxiteles, which suggested Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Marble Faun." The busts of the philosophers, and of the emperors are probably the finest in the world. And here also we saw the Capitoline Venus, a perfect type of feminine grace; and the "Doves on a Fountain-Basin" found in Hadrian's villa, a simple but perfectly beautiful mosaic. One never tires of these rare objects of the highest art.

Near the museum, on the Capitol Hill, is "the Church of the Altar of Heaven," with the famous Bambino. Who has not heard of the Bambino? and what is the Bambino? Il Santo Bambino or, Holy Child, is an image believed to protect persons in imminent danger and is frequently invoked and revered and worshiped, and sometimes borne to the houses of the sick, on such occasions passers-by kneeling at its approach. During Christmas week children come and address their petitions to the Bambino. The whole figure is covered with watches, diamond ornaments and jewels of every description which are placed upon it by devotees. Is this idolatry, or is it not? A prayer to the Bambino repeated a certain number of times secures certain benefits for the living and for the dead.

The Forum of Trajan is one of the ancient places which every one sees. It was formerly an aggregate of splendid edifices, and was considered the most magnificent in Rome. All that is left today is Trajan's column, constructed entirely of marble, 147 feet including the statue of St. Peter which supplants that of the emperor. The column is 11 feet in diameter at the bottom and 10 at the top. Around it runs a spiral band, 3 feet wide, and 660 long, covered with admirable reliefs from Trajan's wars with the Dacians, animals, machines, etc., over 2,500 human figures. Beneath this column Trajan was buried and on top was his statue. It was excavated to the depth of 100 feet and the ruins at its base, broken columns and pavement, show what a Forum once existed there in the great days of the city.

Guido Reni's Aurora in the Rospigliosi Palace, is one of the world's great pictures. It is a ceiling painting and is best studied in a mirror. Aurora is strewing flowers before the chariot of the god of the sun who is surrounded by the dancing hours. The coloring is a marvel. The strongest light is thrown upon the figure of Apollo whose hair and flesh are of a golden hue, and of corresponding tint are the yellowish red robes of the nymphs nearest Apollo. The colors are then gradually shaded off from blue to white and from green to white, while the dun-colored horses accord with the clouds in the background. It is a perfect picture. I enjoyed it more than any other in Rome. To show how people take in such things, however, I said to a very intelligent man, "Did you get to the Rospigliosi?" "O, yes," was the answer, "and I saw the chariot race!" Two other pictures in this gallery are great: Guido Reni's "Andromeda" and Domenichino's "Triumph of David." Near this palace they show you one of those horrible collections of human skeletons such as one sees in Malta and Cologne, the bones of 4,000 monks displayed in all sorts of cunning mosaic work in the church of the Capuchins. It is a ghastly array. Each vault contains a tomb with earth from Jerusalem. In case of a new interment the bones which have longest been undisturbed are used in the decorations. Chicago people, and some others, ornament the skulls with their names in pencil. The Lord deliver us from the fate of these poor fellows. In the church is a picture, Guido Reni's "St. Michael," which is worth the vision of all the bones in Christendom.

Rome has many great churches beside St. Peter's. She has about 365, or one for every day in the year; and some of them are perfect wonders for beauty and treasure. St. John in Laternan, the Cathedral of Rome, is one of the richest. It is a basilica, "Omnium urbis et orbis ecclesiarum mater et caput," and was the principal church of Rome after the time of Constantine. Five great councils have been held here. It has an imposing portico and five entrances. The Porte Santa is walled up and opened only in the year of jubilee. The principal entrance has great bronze doors and on the left is an ancient statue of Constantine. It has many fine statues and paintings, columns and mosaics and claims the heads of Peter and Paul. The Corsini Chapel is specially rich with its ancient columns, vessel of porphyry, and "Picta," and walls inlaid with precious stones. Near this church is the edifice containing the Scala Santa, a flight of twenty-eight marble steps said to be from the palace of Pilate in Jerusalem, which our Savior is said to have ascended. They were brought to Rome by Helena in 326, and may only be ascended on the knees. We saw some of the pious making the ascent. It was here Martin Luther caught the vision of Paul's words, "The just shall live by faith!"

The church of "St. Peter in Chains" is another sanctuary noted chiefly for Michael Angelo's "Moses." This is one of the master's great works. The monument was originally for Saint Peter's and intended to be part of an imposing work of thirty statues. This portion alone was completed. The Moses is represented as usual by mediaeval artists, with horns, owing to an erroneous translation of Ex. 34:35. Rachel and Leah as symbols, one of meditative, and the other of active service, alone were executed by the master with the majestic central figure of the lawgiver. It is one of the world's greatest things.

"St. Paul's Without the Gates" is another of the great churches, to many even more beautiful than St. Peter's. It is a basilica, founded by Theodosius, 388, and greatly embellished by many of the

A Perfectly Digested Breakfast Makes Nerve Force For the Day.

Everything goes wrong if the breakfast lies in your stomach like a mud pie. What you eat does harm if you can't digest it.

A bright lady teacher found this to be true, even of an ordinary light breakfast of eggs and light toast. She says:

"Two years ago I contracted a very annoying form of indigestion. My stomach was in such condition that a simple breakfast of fruit, toast and egg gave me great distress.

"I was slow to believe that trouble could come from such a simple diet but finally had to give it up, and found a great change upon a cup of hot Postum and Grape-Nuts with cream, for my morning meal. For more than a year I have held to this course and have not suffered except when injudiciously varying my diet.

"I have been a teacher for several years and find that my easily digested breakfast means a saving of nervous force for the entire day. My gain of ten pounds in weight also causes me to want to testify to the value of Grape-Nuts.

"Grape-Nuts holds first rank at our table."

popes. It contains what is claimed to be the sarcophagus of Paul who, according to tradition, was interred by a pious woman named Lucina, on her property here. Columns, mosaics, statues, decorations and paintings in this church positively overwhelm you with their magnificence. The interior is 130 long, 65 in width and 75 feet high. The alabaster columns and malachite altars, colossal statues and glowing mosaics of Peter and Paul, portrait medallions of popes and splendid frescoes and paintings, and the vast colonnades are worthy of the great name with which men associate them. Not far away, it is said, three miles out from the Ostian gate, Paul suffered martyrdom.

Another place associated with the great apostle is the Appian Way. This is the military road constructed by Appius Claudius, B. C. 312. It is still a queen of roads, and is the nearest excursion to the Campagna. It affords fine prospects of the country, ruins of aqueducts, mountains and ancient tombs. We passed out the St. Sebastian gate and stopped at the little church, "Domine Quo Vadis," so named from the legend that Peter, fleeing from the death of a martyr, here met his Master and enquired: "Domine, Quo vadis?" to which he received reply, "Venio iterum crucifigi"; whereupon, the apostle ashamed of his weakness, returned. They pretend to show the foot print of Christ. Farther on we entered the catacombs. These subterranean passages where the Christian dead were interred are wonderfully interesting. They extend around the city in a great circle, upwards of forty different ones, covering an area of 615 acres as far as discovered, a total length of 545 miles. The highest are 22-25 feet below the surface, and lowest 40-50 feet. The passages are one above the other, two and a half feet wide with niches one above the other where the bodies were laid, and closed with tablets of marble or terra cotta, usually inscribed in pace, with earthen lamps and symbols of the resurrection; the bodies wrapped in cloth and with various ornaments and memorials. At intervals are large chambers and small chapels; and often statues and pottery, and paintings of the Lord's supper and of his baptism, of the Good Shepherd, and the raising of Lazarus, of Old Testament scenes and the miracles of Christ, of the fish, the special Christian symbol, as the Greek Ichthus consists of the initial letters of the words "Jesus, Christ the Savior, Son of God." These burying places of the martyrs have largely been robbed for relics.

Along this Appian Way Paul entered Rome A. D. 62, and in the month of June. His ship entered Puteoli Bay. Acts 28:11. He met brethren at Tres Tabernae, and "took courage." The Jews show an ancient building of Roman construction in the Ghetto as his "hired house." Here he wrote and here he suffered in the imperial city. It is easy to prove an alibi for Peter. 2 Tim 4:11.

Modern Religious Persecution---A Defense

By B. L. Chase

4. Secret of Persecutor's Power.

What is the secret of the marvelous constancy and fearlessness shown by persecutors? We wonder how in medieval times councils and courts of inquisition could carry out sentences of banishment and death against good men whose only crime was that they did not agree with the persecutors. One would think that their consciences would shrink from the awful business. How unusual, rather unnatural, must have been the souls of those men who could contemplate the suffering of the condemned man or woman at the stake or on the gallows, the agony of the bereft family—the children left without a father and protector, the wife without a husband and companion—and yet obtain the consent of their consciences to carry out the sentence. What gave them such strength of will? It was the courage of their convictions. What gave them such courage of conviction? It was the will of God which they were carrying out. They were sure they were right.

It is this courage of conviction, this intimacy with the will of God, that makes the prophet and the persecutor so much alike. The persecutor, like the prophet, does not go forth in his own strength. He is not trusting his own wisdom, but God's; he is not fighting his own battle, but God's. His judgments against his brethren are righteous judgments, because they are God's judgments. They are done in truth and equity. Right makes might in any cause. This is the secret of the persecutor's strength, for whose business few men have either the courage or the liking. It is this rare quality of character which is possessed by all great leaders—this courage of conviction, this certainty of having God on one's side. It belonged to Mohammed, to Huss, to Loyola, to Luther, to Joseph Smith and to Dowie. No one can question the courage of conviction, on the success of these men.

We do not need to go so far from the ranks of the Disciples for illustrations of the success that attends courage of conviction and certainty of being right. The people like it and rally around those that have it. It has made Dowie a multimillionaire in 10 years, and doubled the circulation of one newspaper in five years. People wil pay money for strong convictions, for the same convictions that they hold. It simply shows the business blindness of some editors who fail to see that the people will pay for only that which they want. They will support loyally the paper or pulpit or college—any institution—that is true to their convictions. How foolish to disagree with the people when they are right. If you stick to the people they will stick to you. We all like people who think as we do. The trouble with Savonarola and other prophets who have been put to death for their convictions was that they were not careful enough to agree with the convictions of others. You will always get into trouble if you do not agree with the majority.

The motto of all successful persecutors has been: "Be sure you are right, then go ahead." God is always on the side of right; while God and the right make a majority. But you wonder how a persecutor can be so sure he is right, when he starts out to put a man to death, as in mediaeval times, or to drive a man from the college, the missionary secretaryship or pulpit, as in modern times. That is so simple a matter that the wayfaring man should not be in doubt. Did not the ancient persecutor have an infallible Pope to tell him the will of God; and does not the modern persecutor have an infallible book to tell him the will of God? But you say he is likely to misinterpret and misunderstand the letter and spirit of the book; while it would be a dreadful thing for him to call a man an "infidel" or a "skeptic," and find out later that he was mistaken as to what the man believed. Then there are so many different interpretations of the Bible, and no one would want to risk the possibility of doing a positive wrong by basing a persecution of a brother upon his private interpretation of the Bible.

In reply to this objection I would remind the objector that he is entirely ignorant of one of the cardinal principles of the Disciples, and shows by his ignorance that he has not been with them long; or else, ought not to remain among them long. Have the Disciples not always taught that one should not interpret the Bible, but simply read it, and

To Change from Coffee to Postum.

"Postum has done a world of good for me," writes an Ills. man.

"I've had indigestion nearly all my life but never dreamed coffee was the cause of my trouble until last Spring I got so bad I was in misery all the time.

"A coffee drinker for 30 years, it irritated my stomach and nerves, yet I was just crazy for it. After drinking it with my meals, I would leave the table, go out and lose my meal and the coffee too. Then I'd be as hungry as ever.

'A friend advised me to quit coffee and use Postum—said it cured him. Since taking his advice I retain my food and get all the good out of it, and don't have those awful hungry spells.

"I changed from coffee to Postum without any trouble whatever, felt better from the first day I drank it. I am well now and give the credit to Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

take its plain literal sense? It is this principle which has preserved their unity, while other religious bodies have divided. It is a principle which helps them to see eye to eye, and heart to heart, upon so many questions; and enables the conservative to love and speak kindly of the progressive, the lower critic of the higher critic, the anti-federationist of the federationist.

This is the principle that gives the persecutor his courage of conviction and of execution; with this sense of certainty and inerrency in his heart, he can go straight as an arrow to the mark. He sets an example of assurance which should be the emulation and envy of every Disciple. It is his mission to weed out error, treason, and hypocrisy, from our midst, and to present us a peculiar people to the sects of this generation—a people among whom there is no difference of opinion. Every one knows that difference of opinion among Christians, is the cause of division; and that there is but one way to have unity, and that is for every one to think and believe alike. This is the high and noble aim of our persecutors—to compel every one among the Disciples to think alike, by thinking as they do. If we pay no heed to their earnest appeals the time will come among the Disciples when there will be disputes, controversies, heart-burnings, and possible division; we might better part with a few men who believe in the higher criticism or federation, than be divided among ourselves. We would become the laughing stock of the religious world when we, a people born with Christian union upon our lips, dispute and wrangle among ourselves. We must never let it come. We must let our leading persecutors save us from it. They are the only ones among us who have convictions and are perfectly sure they are right. Why not let them lead? They are the only ones who have the courage or nerve to carry out persecuting programs. Let us be grateful to them. If every one could think God's thoughts after him, and be sure of it, I would not urge this matter upon the brotherhood. But since we have such men, let us use them; let us honor them with our silver and our gold, and the first fruits of all our increase; let us cease to doubt their infallability, and their right to put away from among us all difference of opinion. Who will look after the heretic, the infidel, the traitor, the federationist, and the higher critic, if they do not? It ought to disqualify a man forever, especially if he be a young man, from holding a position in one of our pulpits, or missionary societies, or colleges, for daring to become an antagonist of one of the chosen persecutors. They are our "leading men." Disagreement with one of them is proof enough that a man is a destructive teacher, an infidel, and a blasphemer. He ought to be cut off from among his brethren, that he may go to "his own place." Let all such copy the example of Judas.

The Content of the Evangelistic Sermon

By J. N. Scholes

The Savior's purpose is to save. "The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost." The sinner needs to be saved. "Lord, save me or I perish." The Gospel is the Lord's means. "It is the power of God unto salvation." The sinner's fundamental means is faith. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." The Lord's chosen method is preaching. "Preach the Word." The sermon is but the method and it must conform to the Savior's purpose and to the sinner's need.

A finished sermon has form, filling, features and application. My chief thought is filling—content, the others are incidental.

I.

Form.—That which is important to form is also necessary—beginning, continuing, and, not too remote, discontinuing (closing.)

Paul said, "Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are very religious. For as I passed by and beheld your devotions I found an altar with this inscription, To the Unknown God. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you." These sentences introduce one of the mightiest sermons of the ages. While we rightly suspect that it is not fully reported, yet we gather certainly, two things: the introduction was brief—it introduced the theme.

Continuing and discontinuing.—Heed not the voice that says, "Why did you close so soon?" It is not the voice of the Spirit. Neither consider seriously the one that says, "You weary me." It is not a voice of authority. Your appointment is not to exhibit the endurance of the faithful, nor to compromise with the carnal dullard, but to preach Christ. Let your sermons be like that man who falls at the zenith of his power: like that mighty river, which, rising beyond no invulnerable obstacles sweeps on and on, turning into its course every legitimate tributary and pours into the sea the volume of its greatest strength.

II.

Filling.—The gospels contain partial reports of forty-five sermons by the Savior touching an infinite variety of subject matter. The Acts contains about half as many sermons and sermonettes conforming closely to the Master's. By these examples present day preaching is limited to the Bible for subject matter, but liberated to the universe for illustration and application. Paul preached his first sermon in Damascus. His theme was, "Jesus is the Christ." Until the fight was finished he knew nothing but Christ and him crucified, and dying, bequeathed his richest legacy in a single sentence, "Preach the Word."

Man's ignorance of self and God are the divine reasons for preaching. Our unceasing obligation proceeds from the fact that Christ hath declared the Father unto men. Entertainment can not excuse, evangelism can not license the omission of these main features. Man does not know God until he knows righteousness, and he does not know righteousness until he sees it in Jesus. Man does not know self until he knows sin, and then his knowledge is to no purpose until he knows that he may be reconciled to God.

All preaching is to one purpose. Evangelism is to make Christians. Pastoralism is to make better Christians, or to make Christians better. One is to make God known, the other is to complete and perfect the acquaintance.

Evangelism is proclaiming the Gospel and drawing men to its acceptance. It is the saved soul telling the lost soul of its salvation and of its Savior. Evangelism is more than moving men—it is saving men. Multitudes are moved in divers directions, preacherward, societyward, churchward, waterward, who are not moved Christward. Christ must be the center of all evangelistic themes—and his love, his mercy, his power, his judgment, his suffering, his word, his authority and his Spirit must reach every point of the circumference.

III.

Features.—Brother Grant Lewis said that he learned homiletics in his father's generously large dooryard. "But how?" said I. "Making snow men," said he. "I just roll up a big one and place it, and then I put one on top, and another on top of that. Then I dig through and it stands on legs. I dig out a little there and a little there, and a little more there, and it has two eyes and a mouth; I pack a little on here, and there, and there, and it has ears and a nose. A roll for an arm on this side and on that and I have a snow man. But it was not a snow man until he added the features. Neither is that pile of promiscuous thought a sermon. The Bible and the world of life are inexhaustible fields of illustration. They both belong to God, and his servant may glorify Jesus Christ by a legitimate use of them in the embellishment of divine thought. Knowledge must have proper conveyance—vehicles of thought-wheels. It can not get to you nor from you without them.

Do not be afraid of being called unscriptural. Some sermons are so scripturally unscriptural as to miss the time by nineteen hundred years and the place by four thousand miles. Remember that you are in America—not in Asia. You are talking to Americans living under the strenuous and pacific administration of Theodore Roosevelt—not to Jews under Herodian dominion: men, multitudes of whom know little beyond the experiences of their own generation. Jesus said, "Preach the Gospel to all creation." Do not leave the impression that it has not taken its departure from Jerusalem but carefully mold it into American thought.

IV.

Application.—Take time to apply. Eliminate, if needful, the introduction, economize on filling that you may have time for application. David Burrell with a fine sense of grace, says, "Preaching is not fencing. The sword must not only be unsheathed and brandished, but it must be driven home." A sermon is a thrust. The nail is driven—it must be clinched. To Paul's experience with God and men Felix listened with respectful official dignity, but when he reasoned of justice, self-control and impending judgment he was terrified.

This is where preaching rises to its truest art. The message is from God, and, to give it authority, the messenger must ever bear the imprint of recent communion with him—for he must not leave his audience looking at any man, but seeing Jesus only. When the saintly Summerfield was dying, he said: "Oh! Now if I might return to my pulpit for an hour, how I could preach! For I have looked into eternity: I have seen God face to face."

The Unity of Christians* By Dr. Alexander Whyte

In British Weekly.

In common with my brethren I have received this letter, which I will now read:

A UNITED EFFORT OF PRAYER.

Sir—We, who subscribe this letter, represent widely different Christian communities. We agree in deprecating at present any large schemes of corporate reunion, which seem to us premature, or any attempts to treat our existing religious divergences as unimportant; but we agree, also, in believing profoundly that our Lord Jesus Christ meant us to be one in visible fellowship; we feel profoundly the paralyzing effect upon the moral forces of Christianity which our divisions inevitably produce, and we recognize with the fullest conviction that it is the duty of all Christians, who desire in this respect the fulfillment of the Divine purpose, to give themselves to penitence and prayer—to penitence, because we have all, in various ways, as bodies and as individuals, contributed to produce and perpetuate differences; and to prayer because what we all alike need is that God should open our minds and hearts to receive without prejudice the gradual revelation of his will as to the ways by which we are to be drawn together.

Being so far agreed, we are venturing, not we believe without the guidance of the Holy Spirit, to approach as far as we can, all the Christian ministers of religion in England to ask them to prepare their congregations for a united effort of prayer on Whitsunday next, at the principal morning service, for the reunion of Christians—special care being taken that such prayer should be entirely uncontroversial, and should involve no assumptions except those which all Christians can make their own, viz.:

That our Lord meant us to be one in visible fellowship:

That our existing divisions hinder or even paralyze his work;

That we all deserve chastisement, and need penitence, for the various ways in which we have contributed to produce or promote division;

That we all need open and candid minds to receive light and yet more light, so that, in ways we perhaps as yet can hardly imagine, we may be led back towards unity.

We believe that by these solemn exercises of penitential devotion dispositions may be created and nourished which will do much to end the needless embitterment so frequently pervading our differences of judgment and creed; and that a freer way may be prepared for the Divine purpose to realize itself.

Along with that so influentially signed letter let this still more influentially signed letter be read, which was addressed to the church at Philippi, and which was brought to Philippi from Rome by Epaphroditus. And especially let this peacemaking passage in this apostolic epistle be well pondered in our day and by ourselves. "If there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfill ye my joy, that ye be likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind." The apostle as good as says: "You write a letter to promote the reunion of your churches and you urge your people to pray and to work for that reunion, and you do well in that. But be sure that you make clear to yourselves and to your people who are the proper persons to propose such a reunion and to pray for it and to work for it. As also make it absolutely clear to yourselves and to them what manner of persons they must be who will ever be employed by God to bring about such a reunion." Let a man examine himself is a fundamental and a universal rule with the apostle. And he applies this fundamental and universal rule of his to all the advocates and to all the promoters of reunion, as well as to all the candidates for the Lord's Supper. And this self-scrutinizing rule of his is not laid down for the leaders and the people of the Philippian church alone; it is laid down for the leaders and the people of the Churches of England and of Scotland, as well as for the leaders and the people of the Greek Church and the Church of Rome. Before the apostle will permit any man, leader or led, to open a mouth or to take up a pen concerning the reunion of Christians, he first demands of that man whether he himself is a truly Christian man or no; whether he himself is truly united to Christ or no; whether or no he has himself received any consolation from Christ amid the dissensions of his own soul and amid the alienations and the enmities of his own life. Because, if a man's own soul is not at peace with God, how can that man be a mediator of peace and reunion in the Church of Christ? He cannot. The thing is impossible. Then, again, let every man examine himself as to this—has he any of the comforts of love in his own soul? For it is the lack of love, and it is the lack of comforts of love, that has been the chief cause of all the disunions and all the divisions in the Church of Christ, as well as in the whole world of mankind. Then, again, there is what Paul here calls the fellowship of the Spirit. That is to say, does the very Spirit of Christ dwell in your heart? Does the very Spirit of Christ really hold his holy temple, with all its spiritual services, in your hidden heart? Because, it is in the communion of the Holy Spirit alone that we are made capable of any true communion with one another. And, then, as the sure result of all that, have you any bowels and mercies? the apostle demands. That is to say, have you any yearning, tenderness of heart, and any true brokenness of heart, over the divisions and the distresses of the Church of Christ? As well as over those multitudes of men who are wholly outside of the Church of Christ, and are aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise? Be it known unto you, says the apostle, that these are the only men who are eligible of God either for prayer, or for proposing plans, or for carrying out plans in connection with the re-uniting of the Church of Christ. Let all other men see to themselves first.

And, then, the proper promoters of reunion being thus tested and selected, there follows the apostolical program of church principles, as we would say, and the true articles of reunion for the whole of Christendom, east and west, north and south. And first: Be ye likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. Likeminded is a great word with Paul. I cannot tell you how often the word likeminded occurs all up and down his pastoral and his homiletical epistles. But how is that likemindedness to be brought about among men? it may well be asked. Many men many minds, is true of the Church of Christ, as well as of the world without. With so many doubtful and dubious matters agitating the minds of men; with so many difficult matters at once in the doctrine, and in the worship, and in the government, and in the manifold life of the Church of Christ; with the facial differences of the nations of the earth, and of the peoples of mankind among whom the Church of Christ has been planted; and with men's education, and enlightenment, and temperament, and religious experiences, and moral and spiritual attainments so very different, how is the same mind at all possible among so many men? Love will do it, replies Paul. Love will do all that needs to be done. Christian men, the very best, will never to the end of time see eye to eye in everything. But they will more and more bear with one another, where they do not see eye to eye. They will more and more accommodate themselves to one another. They will more and more leave many matters open and undetermined; open and undetermined and waiting for more light and more experience and more maturity of mind; but especially open and undetermined and waiting for more love. Paul is a great man for love. John gets more praise for love than Paul gets, but I doubt if he deserves it. John deserves all the praise that he gets, and more; but Paul is not one whit behind John in his doctrine and practice of love; to my mind he is far before him. Having the same love, says Paul, will produce the same mind. Let love be your overruling principle in all your prayers, and in all your negotiations for reunion, says Paul; a real love, a deep love, a self-suppressing, and a self-obliterating love for all the other negotiators, and you will be astonished how the most dividing and difficult matters will begin to clear up and to give way. And, where they do not clear up and give way all at once, continue your attempts at the good work of reunion, still contributing more and more love to one another all round the table of the committee, and all your difficulties are bound to clear up and to give way at last. Nothing can resist love. Just try enough love on the reunion of Christendom and see.

And, in all your debates that tend toward disunion, and then, in all your deliberations and negotiations for reunion, says the apostle, let nothing be done through strife or vainglory. Now, we must all take that rebuke home to ourselves and say, I am the man. The truth is Paul here puts his finger on the real plague-spot in us all, and in all our churches. For it is beyond all dispute that strife and vainglory were largely, if not wholly, the cause of all our original and all our aggravated divisions in past days. There has always been so much strife and vainglory in the Church of Christ that the wonder is she has not been blown into a thousand pieces, and blown out of existence. The wonder is that there is one really united and harmonious body of believers in all the world. As indeed there is not. I alone am wholly in the right in this and in that, and you all are wholly in the wrong. And I will fight against you for my own way with my bitter tongue and with my poisoned pen. And if I cannot silence you with these weapons, then if I have the power I will silence you with the boot, and with the rack, and with the stake, and with the scaffold. A cruel and a persecuting strife like that has in all ages made the Church of Christ to be a very synagogue of Satan, wherever the sword has been grafted on the crook, and wherever the state church could hand over her rebellious children to the civil magistrate. And the same strife and vainglory continue to this very day, and they invade every company even of Christian men. You cannot sit in the most friendly deliberation and discussion for an hour in any company even of sincerely Christian men, without seeing vainglory intruding itself and strife and intolerance beginning to show themselves. So unlike their Master are the best of his disciples; so vain of themselves are the humblest of his disciples; and so full of an ill-suppressed strife are the most peaceful of his disciples. "Nature worketh in us all a love of our own counsels," writes Hooker in his "Ecclesiastical Polity." "And the contradiction of others is a fan to inflame our self-love. Our love, set on fire, to maintain that which once we have said and done sharpeneth our wit to dispute, and to argue, and by all means to fight for what we have said and done." Richard Hooker himself is not always free of strife and vainglory, as Coleridge points out so honestly and so boldly in his "English Divines."

When you come together at any time to debate towards disunion; and again to pray and to work for reunion, the apostle proceeds, let it be in such a lowliness of mind that you will honestly esteem all the other men, both friends and foes, to be better men than yourselves. An impossible demand, you will say. For how can an able man and a good man, as men go; how can such a man with his eyes open count all other men whatsoever to be better men than himself? How can such an estimate of himself and of all other men stand with simple truth and with soberness of mind? An able and honest and a hard-working man cannot surely shut his eyes to the simple fact that he is a far better man than that fool and that sluggard and that rogue around him. Certainly not. But that is not at all the apostle's point. The apostle's point is this. The men that the apostle would have to deal with all matters of debate and discussion and reunion must be men who are clothed from head to foot with humility. That is to say, they must be men who look far more at their own lapses from wisdom and from love than at all the vanity and all the folly and all the self-seeking of other men.

Who Is a Christian in the Twentieth Century?

By E. L. Frazier

There can be but one answer to this question. The same party who was a Christian in the first century. In heaven a plan for the redemption and salvation of man was devised. In the fullness of time the Son of God wrought out that plan.

When he had said on the cross "it is finished," he, after giving instruction and promise and commission to his apostles, went back to heaven. To the apostles he gave the keys of the kingdom and the promise of the Holy Spirit who should guide them into all truth. Note "all truth."

The Holy Spirit came. By the Holy Spirit the apostles were guided. They spake as the Holy Spirit directed. These apostles thus guided told the people how to become Christians. They have had no successors, will have none. They told the people what was required to make Christians in the first century. Their word was final. God has added nothing to it and taken nothing from it.

Who was a Christian in the first century?

The one who believed on Jesus Christ as the Son of God, with all his heart, repented of the wrongs in his past life, and was "baptized into Christ," was a Christian. None others. They were in the kingdom. None others could be. John 3:5 fixes that forever. Baptism was a "burial," a birth of water. That also is fixed.

All knew what faith was. All understood repentance. All knew what baptism was. No man has presumed to change the faith or repentance, but baptism has been tampered with. Many in the twentieth century are honestly mistaken about this point and think sprinkling is baptism. Is sprinkling baptism? Can their honesty and sincerity change what the Holy Spirit taught through the apostles—Spirit guided "into all truth" twenty centuries ago?

It is not a question of what God will do with these sincerely honest people. The question is, are they Christians? About one hundred years ago a church was projected which made Christian character the condition of membership. Many in other religious bodies do so. Some of our people and among them some editors and preachers, are disposed to do so. There is a great difference between a Christian character and a non- or anti-Christian character. All know this and feel drawn to the one showing Christian character. But is he a Christian because he is a Christian in character?

A Masonic character does not make one a Mason. Every Mason knows what makes one a Mason.

An American character does not make one foreign born an American citizen. Every American citizen knows what is required in addition to character to make one an American citizen, and no man thinks his foreign born brother is an American citizen before he takes the oath of allegiance, on character. The government has a right to require this and to prescribe the oath. If a spurious oath be administered and the honest, sincere applicant for citizenship feels that he is an American citizen, and thinks he is, he is mistaken. That is all.

All the character in the world can not make a man a husband in this country. The most devoted love can not make him a husband. Here is something fixed. The proper authority must pronounce him a husband.

We have no quarrel with the grand lodge or with the government. We just submit. One may be Christian in faith and in heart and in character, but it takes this and "baptized into Christ" to make him a Christian in fact.

I dare not and will not say any man is a Christian who is not a baptized believer. I dare say no man is a baptized believer who has not been immersed. The time has come in our history and experience as a people when it is necessary to take a positive stand on this all important matter.

The logic of the situation requires that we admit every Christian to membership in the church. I accept it.

I will receive any first century Christian into the church.

I have been a close observer of our movements for some years, and give it as my opinion that just now the thing we need most of all is to take a positive and open stand on this matter. Let all the world know that we give credit for Christian character and feel drawn to those who give signs of it, but let all the world know that we do not think one is a Christian until he has been "baptized into Christ." Here I stand.

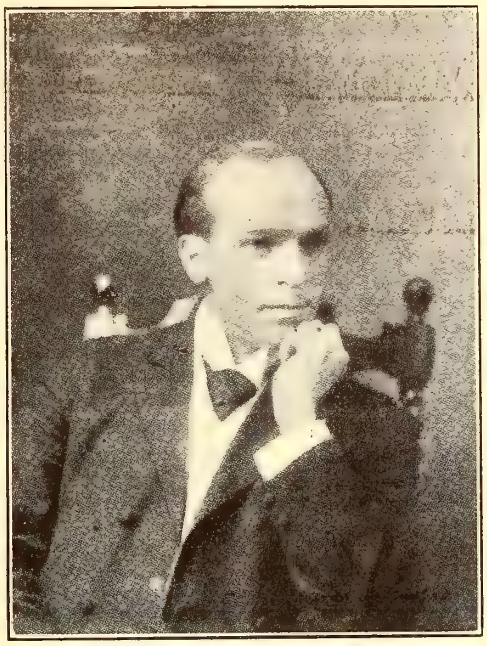
Reports From California

By Charles Reign Scoville

Jessie Williams,
Press Reporter, Long Beach, Cal.



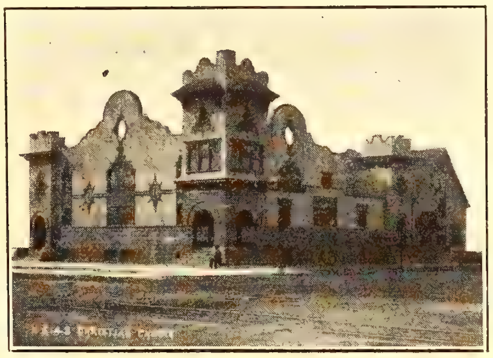
Charles Reign Scoville.

Mrs. W. C. Reynolds,
President Home Department, Long Beach, Cal.

I have just spent a most delightful season of two months on the Pacific coast. I was there "on business for the King." Brother DeLoss Smith was with me in the last meeting at Long Beach and Brother and Sister Percy M. Kendall were with me through both meetings.

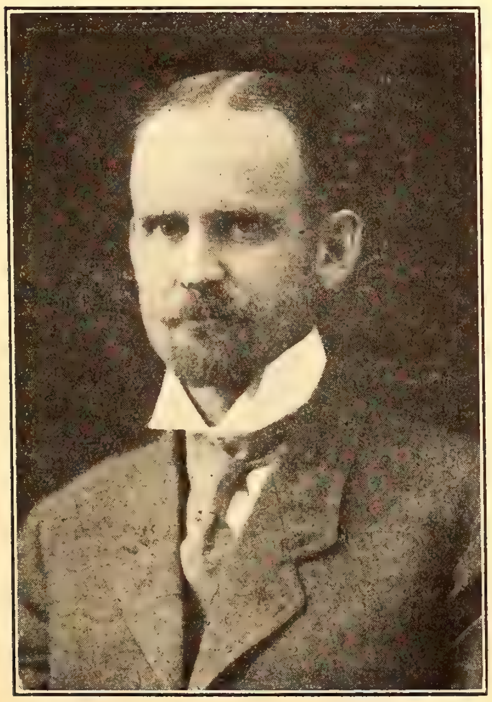
I began in San Bernardino and was only there two weeks and three days with 190 added in all. The pastor, Bro. H. E. Wilhite, resigned just before I reached there. Another pastor was chosen, who resigned before he began his work, and the church was not ready for a great ingathering under the circumstances, and I decided that it was not best to stay and gather in a host of souls with no shepherd to look after them, so went on to Long Beach. We have some noble souls at San Bernardino, and some man can do a great work there. Brother Wilhite entered the evangelistic field and has the ability to hold great meetings.

I reached Long Beach on decoration day, just after the soldiers had cast hundreds of California's most beautiful flowers on the waves of the Pacific, thus decorating the graves of those who died at sea while in defense of their country. Our Long Beach pastor and Bro. S. A. Sanderson had visited the former meeting and I had a vivid recollection of Brother Sanderson, for it was he who cornered me at the San Francisco convention and refused to be refused a meeting.



First Christian Church,
Long Beach, Cal.

I told him that if he would be as persistent in personal work for sinners as he was to get the evangelist there we would have a great meeting, and he promised he would. He kept this promise, even giving up his business for a time to push the advertising work, of which committee he was chairman. Arthur Everts, of Dallas, Texas; R. E. Carpenter, of



W. L. Porterfield,
Sunday-School Superintendent and President State Sunday-School Association, Long Beach, Cal.

E. W. Thornton,
Pastor, Long Beach, Cal.

S. A. Sanderson,
Chairman Advertising Committee, Long Beach, Cal.

New York city, and S. A. Sanderson, of Long Beach, are the three greatest men I have ever had at the head of the most important committee of a gospel meeting.

The Long Beach church rented a tabernacle at a cost of $300. They did the work as though they meant business from start to finish. The city was full of visitors for it is the Atlantic City of the Pacific, except that it is a saner, nobler, better city. Although two great skating rinks, a vast auditorium, a Beach City band with all other attractions were running full blast all the time, the meeting was a grand success. Two hundred and fifty-five souls accepted Christ, and many people of talent and influence were among the converts.

When we came to the close they paid me the largest salary I have ever received, except from one other church, which paid me the same. This church was only organized eleven years ago with twelve charter members. The city then had only one thousand inhabitants, and now numbers 20,000. Bro. Grant K. Lewis, whom I knew in college days, and who is now general secretary of Southern California and Arizona, took charge of the church in 1902. The church then had only seventy-five members, with a Sunday-school of thirty members. Brother Lewis resigned one year ago to take the above named position. Bro. E. H. Keller acted as pastor until November, 1905, doing a splendid work for so short a period, and then E. W. Thornton was chosen pastor. Brother Thornton, like Brother Lewis, is a grand whole-souled man of faith and was a mighty inspiration to the writer in all the work. He is greatly beloved by all the membership and has all the sunshine of his "Old Kentucky Home" in his make-up. Mrs. Thornton is a most excellent woman, who fills her place at church and in her home like a queen.

The membership of the church is now about 600, and with an average midsummer Sunday-school attendance of 325. The Long Beach church is one of our best California churches. W. L. Porterfield, Sunday-school superintendent, is also state superintendent of Sunday-schools, and one of the grandest Christian business men in the brotherhood. He will be heard from in more ways than one if the Lord spares his life to us. The sacrifice he made for the meeting was enough to stir an evangelist even if the whole church had been asleep. But the church was awake.

Mrs. Grant K. Lewis is one of the best primary superintendents on the Pacific coast, and she has great influence with the Christian Endeavor in directing its missionary work. Mrs. Wiley, formerly president of District C. W. B. M., is president of the society at Long Beach, which only has seventy members, but much new material.

Carle Ridenour and Miss Elizabeth Venable are president of the Senior and Intermediate Christian Endeavorers. Mrs. M. S. Julian is president of Ladies' Aid. Mrs. W. C. Reynolds is superintendent of the home department of the Sunday-school and is a woman of ability and consecration and a soul-winner. The pity is that some people get into office who neither do anything themselves nor will they permit others to go ahead in gleaning for the Master. C. J. Hargis is chairman of the official board, and an elder of the church. Miss Nellie Gunder is president of the Young Ladies' Missionary Circle, and it is a live society.

Miss Jessie Williams, formerly of New York city, and whose father is one of the strong men in Dr. Breeden's church, Des Moines, where we won a mighty victory in 1901, was our reporter, and we never had better or more spicy reports. They read as if a reporter of years experience had written them. Although Miss Williams is assistant cashier of one of the best banks in Long Beach, she is worthy of a larger field. I was most excellently entertained by Brother and Sister Fry, formerly of my old home state, Indiana, The church is remarkable for its stability and foresight. The property is worth $45,000 and did not cost one-half that. A lot has been bought on the west side for the establishing of a second church. This lot has practically doubled in value since it was purchased. Brother Windham, formerly of Central America, is also a great worker in the church and, like Brother Porterfield, one of the large promoters of the coast. It was really a privilege to work with such a church and I shall hail with the greatest pleasure the moment when time permits me to turn my face toward Long Beach.

The pastors of that part of the state were often at the meetings. I spoke for our splendid church at Santa Anna one Monday night and the house was crowded. The Southern California churches will hold simultaneous meetings in May and June next year. They invited me to become superintendent of the entire movement, and while I may not be able to do that as they so earnestly requested, yet I was glad to remain over and give them many suggestions and start the movement one year ahead and thus on time. I came as far as San Francisco with the state Christian Endeavor train en route to the state convention at Berkeley. Brother Sanderson had charge of our delegation and I hear was chosen assistant state superintendent of the Christian Endeavor.

I am sorry that I do not live in Long Beach, that's all.

We have reached 2,914 souls for Christ so far in 1906.

"Baptism Unto Remission."

By J. WILL WALTERS.

President Mullins' paper at the congress of Disciples of Christ at Indianapolis upon the subject, "What is the New Testament Teaching on the Relation of Baptism to the Remission of Sins and the New Birth?" is as strong and as succinct a defense of the theory that baptism is for "ceremonial cleansing" and not "actual cleansing" (or forgiveness) as it has been my privilege to hear. The spirit of the article is also gracious and admirable. But I think its fallacy must be apparent to every one who has learned to rightly divide the word of truth and whose views have not been too greatly distorted by preconceived ideas regarding the subject. But many have not so learned. And while I consider Bro. I. J. Spencer's "Review" (in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, May 10) an able exposition of its fallacy, yet a few additional lines may not be amiss.

President Mullins presents two "closed circles," as he terms them. One, in which are found certain Scriptures connecting baptism and remission of sins, and another circle "vitally connecting faith and repentance with remission"—without any reference whatever to baptism.

He therefore endeavors to harmonize the two circles by concluding that faith and repentance are conditions of actual forgiveness, while baptism is simply a condition of ceremonial forgiveness. Hear his own words:

"It is that in one closed circle of teachings, the ceremonial, we find a distinct ceremonial principle in Christianity; that in the other closed circle of passages we find a distinct spiritual principle; and there is no union or amalgamation of these two principles on the one hand and there is no conflict between them on the other."

That there is no conflict we must all readily agree, but is not the explanation and harmony found in a way which will not do violence to the word of God, or make void that law by such a theory? I would call attention to the following rule of interpretation or exegesis: "Where salvation is predicated in God's word upon any one thing, it can not be ascribed to less than that upon which it is predicated. It may be predicated upon more, but never upon less."

We find salvation or remission of sins dependent upon baptism, Acts 2:38; Mark 16:16; Acts 22:16, etc. Shall we say it can be conditioned upon less and not do violence to the word of divine truth? Evidently not, without violating the rule, and also the word of God.

If we teach that baptism is not for actual, but only for "ceremonial" or "symbolical remission" of sins, many will say: "It matters not whether I am 'ceremonially cleansed' or 'symbolically forgiven,' just so I am assured of 'actual forgiveness.'"

Peter did not say (Acts 2:38): "Repent and be baptized for the ceremonial remission of your sins," but "for the remission of your sins." Repentance and baptism looked forward to the same object. If baptism was for ceremonial remission, so was repentance.

Faith and love are not going to stop and quibble over human theories, whether baptism for remission does not mean actual, but only "ceremonial remission," but desiring to know the truth and nothing but the truth, will ask, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" And if we shall faithfully proclaim what he hath recorded in his word they will be satisfied to do his will and claim the blessed promise of sins forgiven.

The Unseen Shore.

A few who have watched me sail away
Will miss my craft from the busy bay:
Some friendly barks I anchored near,
Some loving souls that my heart held dear,
In silent sorrow will drop a tear.
But I shall have peacefully furled my sail
In mornings sheltered from storm or gale,
And greeted the friends who have called before
O'er the Unknown Sea to the Unseen Shore.

Our Budget

—"For web begun God sends thread."

—This means: That God loves and crowns a venturesome faith.

—That if the membership will earnestly try to pay its indebtedness, he will supply the wherewithall for church debts.

—That a congregation needing more commodious quarters, a more creditable temple, can have material in proportion to its constructive faith.

—That if in life's stresses, we go cheerfully as far as to-day's courage enableth, we shall receive such new enduements that we may attempt all our tasks with cheerful courage—one of life's real victories.

—That the union of his people for which Jesus prayed and that is the fundamental purpose of this Restoration will be quickly accomplished, if we will use all that the various religious bodies now hold in common as grafting boughs, for he gives life and vitality to "threads" like these.

—That while we have our limitations, are bounded by who our father is, by what our mother thought when a girl, by the scenes of childhood, the bent of our nationality, and all our physical and moral environment, yet there are no hedges above us, and he will give us inspiration and power to rise for our loom, if we begin weaving the heavenly impulses we now have for a tie to the stars or the throne.

—Thomas J. Easterwood, of Temple, Tex., offers his services to evangelists and churches as a helper in song.

—H. A. Pallister, of Delta, Ia., is located with the church at Exira, same state, and desires correspondents to note change.

—The South Idaho state board wishes two evangelistic pastors to work amid real hardships. Volunteers may write to Dr. Semones, of Nampa, Idaho.

—J. W. Reynolds, of Saunemin, Ill., was an office visitor last week. In him some church desiring a minister will find a faithful and capable helper.

—The Fredericksburg, Ohio, church will sell for $15 two large chandeliers costing them $65 when new. The church there is now lighted with gas and offers this bargain to some of our poor congregations.

—M. B. Ingle, assisted by H. A. Easton, recently organized a church of seventeen members at Lipscomb, Texas. Five of these were baptized during the progress of a union meeting in the neighborhood.

—C. C. Atwood, of Topeka, Kan., and Mrs. Atwood began their "fall campaign" this year in mid-summer. They are now in a meeting at Circleville, Kan. Sister Atwood directs a great chorus through these services.

—E. J. Church, of Seneca, Mo., is in a meeting at Newtonia, with thirty-one additions to date and more sure to follow. This reminds us that never in our memory have summer meetings been so successful as those of 1906.

—W. A. Wherry has been instrumental in adding 23 to the membership of the Commerce, Tex., church recently. He is now in a meeting at South Sulphur Mission. Brother Wherry is being greatly blessed in his ministry.

—Eugene H. Holmes, in reporting the recent meeting at Plano, Texas, in which there were 46 accessions to the church, says H. A. Northcutt grows in power as he grows in years, and that the Zerans are most efficient workers in revival services.

—J. W. Holsapple, of Greenville, Tex., is visiting his aged mother in the old Kentucky home. While there he will hold a brief meeting at Benton. He reports two added to the Greenville church by confession and baptism the past week.

—Louis S. Cupp and wife, of the Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, will spend a month's vacation along the St. Lawrence river. His pulpit will be supplied in his absence. Brother and Sister Cupp have fairly earned this vacation granted by their church.

—This office has been favored with an announcement of the marriage of Harriett Hyatt Parker, of Mitchell, Ind., to Charles Rollin Hudson, pastor of the Frankfort (Ky.) church. We wish these young people long lives of ever-increasing happiness and usefulness.

—Wallace M. Stuckey is in a meeting at Galesburg, Kan. Among other helps employed he uses 300 Christian-Evangelists each week. This not only fills his house with auditors, but with prepared listeners. All who have adopted this plan most highly commend it to others. Any church will be greatly blessed that secures the services of this talented servant of the Master.

Wallace M. Stuckey.

—A Red and Blue contest in the Mendon, Mo., church was won by the Reds. Among other results of the contest was the addition of 48 to the membership. The minister, D. Millar, beautifully commends the work of Superintendent Foster Windell.

—G. P. Coler, dean of our Bible chair at Ann Arbor, Mich., knows a good teacher of Latin and psychology whom he will recommend to any of our colleges needing such faculty help. This man is a loyal Disciple, well trained in Bible study and a preacher of ability.

—W. J. Lockhart, of Des Moines, and C. H. Altheide, of Bloomfield, Ia., will assist Frank L. Bowen, city evangelist of Kansas City, in a meeting with the Jackson avenue church, beginning September 2. This combination ought to produce great results.

—J. O. Heddleston, of East Liverpool, O., recently preached to a great audience at Chester, W. Va. He reports a Bible-study class that meets every Lord's day evening, which is one of the most effective helps to the church that he has ever seen.

—President W. W. Herold sends a copy of the Pettis county Christian church convention program. From the names on the program and the topics assigned, this should be a very helpful gathering. The sessions will be held at Green Ridge August 20 and 21.

—"Fragments," a local paper published by the Union Church in Christ, Monroe, Wis., announces that Charles Reign Scoville is to begin a union revival meeting at the armory in that place the first week in August. He is to be assisted by DeLoss Smith, singing evangelist.

—Miss Mayme Eisenbarger will lead the singing in a revival G. A. Reynolds will begin with the Dyersburg, Tenn., church September 12. After September 1 Sister Eisenbarger will be open for other engagements in this special work to which she is devoting herself.

—The Christian-Evangelist wishes to acknowledge many courtesies by W. P. Keeler, of the Englewood congregation, Chicago. Though a member of the great Marshall Field Dry Goods Company he devotes much time to matters pertaining to the kingdom. He is prospering. "Haec fabula docet," etc.

—We are pleased to note that the Commissioners of the Jamestown Exposition, which opens April 26, 1907, have decided that the grounds shall be closed against all visitors on Lord's days, and that the influence of this great fair will be exerted altogether in favor of the American Lord's day, instead of the European Sunday.

—Our beloved Bro. N. J. Aylsworth, of Auburn, N. Y., writes concerning the editorial series on Christian Union, recently closed, and now undergoing revision, as follows: "Nothing more valuable and timely has appeared in our literature for a long time, and I am glad it is to appear in more permanent form."

—The new church building at Armington, Ill., will be dedicated the first Lord's day in September. L. E. Chase, the minister, has just accepted a call to serve the LeRoy, Ill., church, for the ensuing three years. Brother Chase's pastorate at Armington was an epoch-making period in the history of that congregation.

—F. H. Lemon reports 80 additions to the Boise (Idaho) church since beginning there, January 14. We wonder if the alleged discouragements to our cause in the great northwest are not to some extent the spectres of lack of faith in the power of the Gospel to reach and save men and build up churches. Brother Lemon sees no signs of failure.

—Edward O. Tilburn is rejoicing over arrangements made for liquidating the indebtedness of $900 against his Mishawaka (Ind.) church by the first of the new year. In appreciation of Brother Tilburn's faithful services his church has granted him a month's vacation, during which time he will visit his former congregations at Tonawanda and Buffalo, N. Y.

—Jewell Howard, of Amarillo, Texas, orders 18 sets of the Bethany Reading Courses for the benefit of the Ladies' Aid Society of his church. It is a very happy thought to have these faithful women thus growing in knowledge of the Lord and his church, while with skillful fingers they are helping in the material development of the local congregation. We commend Brother Howard's idea to others.

—For the last two months Edward O. Tilburn, Mishawaka, Ind., has been lecturing to large audiences at the Thursday night services on the "Plea of the Christian Church and How to Make It Successful." This will be followed by an evangelistic campaign later, when he will be assisted by W. E. M. Hackelman, of Indianapolis, as musical director. A great victory for righteousness is expected.

—John Neighbor, of Greenup, Ill., a singing evangelist, offers to assist evangelists and churches needing his services.

—H. K. Shields, singing evangelist, is helping J. W. Witkamper in a meeting at Elwood, Ind. A great ingathering is confidently expected.

—T. P. Reid, formerly pastor of the Nicolaus, Cal., church, has been called to the work at Acampo. We believe this means great growth to this congregation.

—Evangelist W. L. Harris, of Bethany, Neb., wishes to join with him in an evangelistic team a good Gospel singer. Brother Harris now has engagements carrying him over until 1907.

—The new church at Heyworth, Ill., will be dedicated September 9. The ministry of John P. Givens, always successful, has been eminently so with that congregation.

—The Disciples of Christ of Wayne and Holmes counties, Ohio, will hold their yearly meeting at Fredericksburg August 24-27. A cordial invitation is extended all Disciples to attend this meeting.

—Dinger and Gardner begin a meeting with Neel Overman at Lincoln, Kan., next Lord's day. There is a combination that should make this an epoch-making meeting in the history of that church.

—Evangelist E. M. Romine visited the office Monday. Brother Romine belongs to that untiring, hard-working band of evangelists who, without much personal celebrity, accomplish great things for the kingdom.

—Charles E. McVay, song evangelist, of Benkelman, Neb., has an open date through September. Brother McVay sings the Gospel with the spirit and understanding and we cheerfully commend him to the churches.

—We regret to learn that W. A. Haynes, of Skidmore, Mo., lost over $500 worth of books by fire on August 2. The loss of the preacher's library, with its references and loved passages and volumes, can not be estimated in terms of dollars.

—It is with pleasure we hear many tributes of admiration paid to Mrs. H. A. Denton, president of the Missouri C. W. B. M. This is a great cause, it now has great opportunity, and Sister Denton is proving herself to be eminently the woman for the hour.

—E. S. Allhands, whose work at Roff gives one of the brightest pages in our history in Indian Territory, has resigned to become a general evangelist. His first meeting will be at Arkadelphia. This able preacher should be kept busy among the churches.

—V. E. Ridenour will assist George L. Peters in a meeting at South Joplin, Mo., in September. This is Brother Ridenour's third meeting in Joplin. He will also assist W. T. Turner at Hamilton Ave. during the St. Louis simultaneous meetings in November.

—Charles E. Smith, of St. Stephen, state evangelist of South Carolina, wants a good preacher to act as pastor-evangelist for a district of churches in South Carolina. Only an energetic man thoroughly acquainted with the Word need apply. Correspondents must enclose postage.

Though he has been in ill health several months he is encouraged to believe that complete restoration is near at hand.

—A clipping from a Sapulpa, I. T., paper contains the account of the dedication of the new Christian church there July 22. The dedication sermon was preached by S. R Hawkins. The account contains a glowing tribute of the ability of Bro. Randolph Cook, who is holding revival services in the new church.

—Our summer meetings are phenomenally successful, and will be more general hereafter. The evangelists, too, who are adding most to the saved, are those who uncompromisingly preach the old Gospel of faith, repentance, confession, baptism and good works, death to the old life and a rising up to a new life in Christ.

—At the recent Santa Cruz convention Thomas G. Picton, R. E. Jape and Otho Wilkison were for the third time selected to constitute the state Sunday-school board in Northern California. We believe our work generally will be more honored by continuing faithful servants in office than by passing around the honors to inexperienced men.

—W. A. McCausland, of Coffeyville, Kan., practices law through the week and preaches most helpfully to the Deering congregation five miles in the country on Lord's days. Our great dearth of preachers would be somewhat atoned for, if more of our brethren gifted in the Word as Brother McCausland is, would follow his example.

—Brother A. R. Moore, of Seneca, Mo., informs us the Newton county convention will be held in that town the first week in October, and that it will be followed with a three weeks' meeting, if an evangelist and singer can be secured for that time. Evangelists may write him. He reports fifteen additions to the Seneca church during the year.

—A note from P. A. Dickson, of the City Temple Christian Church, Sidney, Australia, informs us that our 10 churches in that city are all prospering. It is the expectation to organize others in the near future. The City Temple hopes, as a result of its recent protracted meeting, to build anew in a better part of the city. The congregation now numbers about 500.

—John T. Brown, of Louisville, has just concluded a meeting in the City Temple Church of Christ, Sidney, Australia, which is said to have been the greatest revival ever held on the island. There were 185 confessions and baptisms. Hundreds of people in that city of 500,000 heard our plea for the first time, and it is thought the meeting will bear fruit for years to come.

—From Lewis O. Lehman, minister, we learn that Harold E. Monser recently closed a tent meeting in Havana, Ill., resulting in ten immediate additions to the church. One has united since. Mrs. J. E. Powell, of Bloomington, assisted as leader of song. This is an exceedingly difficult field, and these additions by no means represent the results of the meeting.

—M. M. Davis, of the Central Church of Dallas, Texas, recently delivered an address on "The Unfolding of the New Testament," before the Dallas Chautauqua assembly. It is always a pleasure to see our brethren prominent in Chautauqua work, and taking advantage of other opportunities of impressing the people with the skill and attainments of our ministry.

—The Dexter (Mo.) Chautauqua, under the superintendency of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Stokes, of Kansas City, is holding largely attended, very interesting and helpful sessions. R. H. Lampkin, of the Christian church there, has charge of the Bible study classes, and is otherwise so connected with the work as to make it redound to the strengthening of our church with the public.

—The revival spirit is still prevailing at Fredericktown, Mo., where R. O. Rogers, the pastor, recently concluded his great meeting. Every department of the church is in a most prosperous condition. Brother Rogers has just introduced THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST into eighteen new homes there, which will help to make permanent the present happy conditions.

fice force, en route to their Texas home. Brother Smith graduated from the Lexington Bible school last spring and has met with gratifying success in his first pastorate. We trust this young couple will realize their highest ideals of happiness and usefulness and worth.

—A. T. June, of Everett, Mass., reports two recent additions to his congregation and all departments of his church prospering. America has no truer heroes than these brethren who, amidst discouragements at home, and many allurements elsewhere, are tarrying by the stuff in our New England stations. But we are coming, brethren, we are coming, and soon your few will be transformed into hosts.

—Hon. W. A. McCausland writes that the Coffeyville, Kan., church has called Ellis Purlee, who for four years has so acceptably served the church, to an indefinite pastorate, the fond hope being that he will continue with them many years. Evangelist Thomas Cooksey, of Ohio, will assist Brother Purlee in a meeting beginning September 1. This should be a very successful revival.

—A great camp meeting, under the auspices of the Wichita County Camp Meeting Association, will be held at Hyars Hole, on Medicine Creek, seven miles northwest of Lawton, Okla., August 27-29. W. A. Merrill, of Hobart, and O. L. Smith, of El Reno, will do the preaching. C. M. Bliss, of El Reno, will conduct the musical services. We advise all our readers who can to attend.

—H. M. Allen, of Elyria, Ohio, father of our Edgar W. Allen, of the West Jefferson Street Church, Ft. Wayne, Ind., is at Hope Hospital, in the latter place, preparing to undergo a surgical operation. The elder Brother Allen has preached in Ohio and Michigan for more than a generation. He asks the prayers of the brotherhood to the end that he may be fully restored to his place in the ministry.

—We are indebted to H. F. Barstow, the faithful corresponding secretary of our Wisconsin Missionary Board, for items of interest relating to the convention of our churches to be held at Ladysmith, September 20-23. All expecting to attend should notify F. L. Dean, of Ladysmith, that entertainment may be provided. A very strong program has been provided, and all who possibly can should attend.

—R. H. Bolton, of Boston, Mass., secretary of the New England Missionary Society, is entitled to the credit of the authorship of the splendid article on "Our Cause in New England" which appeared in the issue of July 19. We hope for further communications from Brother Bolton. The Christian-Evangelist's circulation is rapidly increasing in New England, and we wish our news service to at least keep pace therewith.

—Mrs. J. E. Smith, of Royerton, Ind., writes an expression of the profound gratitude that congregation entertains for the Christian Publishing Company for sending its evangelist, J. D. Lawrence, for the meeting that so greatly revived the church. Brother Lawrence is ready to assist other churches that can only partly pay for the services of an evangelist. Parties wishing such meetings may either address this company or J. D. Lawrence, Muncie, Ind.

—J. N. Armstrong, president of the Christian Bible school at Odessa, Mo., will begin a series of meetings in the vicinity of Marcus and Easton avenue, this city, August 12. A large tent has been secured for the use of this meeting. Bro. J. W. Atkinson gives us this information. We bespeak the prayers of thousands of St. Louis Disciples that the Church of Christ may be greatly strengthened and unbuilded by these meetings.

—The Christian Endeavor Society of the First Church, East Liverpool, O., has elected the following officers: President, Okey Heddleston; Vice-president, Chas. Aley; Sec., Mary Stanley; Cor. Sec., Margaret Hague; Treas., Isaac Connolly. These youg people are holding positions with opportunities for doing a greater and more lasting good than is accomplished by many Governors and other executive officers of states. May they magnify their offices.

—The "Wilkes-Barre Times" gives generous space to a report of the convention of the Eastern Pennsylvania Disciples that has just closed its sessions in that city. This is said to be the largest, most enthusiastic yet practical convention our people have yet held in that territory. The paper gives great praise to E. E. Cowperthwaite for the development of this religious movement into a power with which sin and sectarianism in Eastern Pennsylvania have to reckon.

—The Webster City (Ia.) church held a mortgage burning service August 7. Milton H. Lee, of Ft. Dodge, and W. C. Cole, of Jewell Junction, greatly encouraged the congregation by their addresses. R. M. Dungan, the happy minister, writes that the membership caught glimpses of a new and more glorious era about to dawn upon that congregation. The church is free from indebtedness, the first time in thirteen years. Brother Dungan has been called to continue as minister at a substantial increase in salary.

—The Illinois Christian Missionary Convention will meet with the Paris church September 10 to 13. Among those from out the state whose names appear on the program we note Dr. Mary Longdon, Deoghur, India; Mesdames Anna R. Atwater and Helen E. Moses, of Indianapolis; Mrs. Ida W. Harrison, Lexington, Ky; J. W. Henry, Mobile, Ala; J. H. Garrison, St. Louis; G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, and E. L. Powell, Louisville. In addition to these is an equally brilliant galaxy of Illinois speakers, both men and women.

—Frank L. Bowen has made splendid proof of his ministry as city evangelist of Kansas City. He is just entering upon his tenth year. When he began there were seven pastors in that metropolis of the Missouri valley; to-day there are twelve, with four mission stations at present and others to be instituted in the autumn. The city missions have added 1,000 to the membership and have acquired $25,000 in property. In a letter Brother Bowen highly commends his faithful co-laborers in that city, both of the pulpit and pew.

—G. M. Read, minister; L. A. Lowry, elder, and E. M. Shelley, treasurer, of the Weiser, Idaho, church, make an earnest appeal to the brotherhood for financial assistance. The church there was involved in an indebtedness by parties who have now removed from the city, which the present membership is unable to pay. Weiser is a growing city where we ought to have a strong church. If this indebtedness is removed this will be one of our most hopeful fields in the west. Contributions to the debt fund may be sent to Treasurer E. M. Shelley.

—Mrs. H. S. Hubbard, Haverhill, Mass., too late for publication, sends us observations of the great Manchester meeting. This sentiment taken from her letter shows the opinion of one on the ground: "Now that the good work has been so grandly started in New Hampshire, I trust every Disciple preacher in New England will exert himself to keep it alive until Brother Yeuell can return." Surely all who have contributed to this success will rejoice in the part they have had. Let us proceed without any abatement of enthusiasm in the collection of funds for the establishment of the church in the near future.

—A. B. Jones, writing from Colorado where he is summering with his children, says: "Every few years some one suggests that we (the Disciples) are passing a 'crisis' and I think we have passed several. At times the outlook has appeared stormy and doubtful, but the old ship of Zion has somehow always weathered the storm and she is yet seaworthy." Brother Jones heartily approves the attitude of The Christian-Evangelist in recent discussions and says its position is "invulnerable." He is enjoying his Colorado outing, of course, but it is easy to see that he is longing for the lakeside once more, his fishing rod, and that electric thrill which only a "good bite" can give.

—We regret to learn that Herbert Yeuell has been summoned to England to see his mother, whose health is very precarious. Brother and Sister Yeuell and son, Donovan, sailed August 3. He will return in time to assist J. J. Castleburg at Union City through a revival in the early autumn. W. E. M. Hackleman will have charge of the music through this meeting. Correspondents are requested to address Brother Yeuell at Washington, D. C., where their mail will be cared for. We hope to hear of Mother Yeuell's improvement in health, and that her two evangelist sons may long be blessed with the inspiration of her earthly presence.

—The veteran John S. Sweeney, of Paris, Ky., paid the office force a visit last Monday that was greatly enjoyed. For thirty years he served the church at Paris as pastor. His earlier ministry was in Illinois. He is now visiting amidst the scenes of his first triumphs in the Gospel. He will soon preach in the church where he held his first debate (he certainly can not remember where all the others were held), and will preach again where his first sermon was delivered. Though past the three score years and ten, he preaches and lectures with great power. Long may he live to witness the prosperity of the Cause he so greatly helped to establish in the middle west.

—Church Extension has a hearing on another page. The case is stated carefully; contains information the churches ought to have and should be read by all. If Brother Muckley does not in this appeal awaken our churches, only Gabriel can blow the trumpet call that will arouse them to the needs and opportunities of the hour. The board has a great work on its hands. It ought to be enabled by our churches to do that work creditably to our brotherhood. We have no right to elect our boards as trustees for us and then desert them on the one day of the offering. See that your church is in line. This is not too early to begin preparations, for the annual offering commences the first Sunday in September.

—None among us loves more than our Editor to meet with the brethren in our conventions and other summer assemblies. None other has done more to make them popular and helpful, but it is denied to him to participate in them this summer. The family physician has ordered this veteran of the civil war, and this soldier whose service in the Lord's army antedates the harrowing sixties, that until frost comes he must not descend far from 44 degrees latitude N. Since he so reluctantly admits any abatement of his remarkable physical stamina of war times it is only just to Brother Garrison and program committees all over the land that this decision of Aesculapius (from which we permit no appeal) should be made known.

—In "Gloria in Excelsis" you have given us a book worthy of our great brotherhood. It is the peer of any hymn book on the market. It has many excellent features. The responsive readings are well chosen. They fill a great need. The classification is complete, placing its wealth of material at the easy command of the user. It is just the right size. It is large enough to cause the singer to feel that it is generous. It is not large enough to make it awkward to handle. The hymns contain the best thought, theology and poetry in use to-day. It contains the best old tunes and the best new tunes. The best tunes abound. It is stately, dignified, worshipful in spirit. I pronounce it par excellance. Our churches will not be long in discovering its worth.—James H. Mohorter.

Sidelights on a Successful Pastorate.

The church at Fort Smith, Ark., has enjoyed the ministrations of the present pastor, E. T. Edmonds, since 1891, excepting two years of this time, when Brother Edmonds served as pastor for the church at Boston, Mass. The church at Fort Smith at the time Brother Edmonds began his labors there had a membership of about 100, but they represented in a degree quite unusual for such a small membership many of the best families in the community, and more than a proportionate part of the social and financial strength of the community. Gradually the church has grown until now the membership is close to the 500 mark. The church supports its own Living Link missionary in the northwest part of the state of Arkansas, and contributes to all the missionary interests of the church. The present church building is one of the best in all the southwest. It is built of Eureka Springs (Ark.) stone, and the tower is considered by competent judges to be an architectural gem. Indeed, all the visitors to the city of Fort Smith are surprised to find so splendid an edifice in a town that for many years was one of the border towns of the southwest. The auditorium will seat about 800 people. The present cost of the church and lot would be about $35,000. It is on one of the finest streets in the city, and, excepting the Catholic church, occupies the finest site in the town.

E. T. Edmonds,
Fort Smith, Ark.

The pastor recently lectured to the Jews of Fort Smith in the local synagogue, and preached to them in his church. Brother Edmonds has thoroughly identified himself with the city in which he lives, and speaks at public meetings on such questions as civic improvements, etc. Recently he has taken into the church an Advent minister, and not long ago baptized a Congregational minister.

Brother Edmonds has been for many years the president of the Fort Smith Chautauqua Association and is now the superintendent.

C. A. Young, of Chicago, last spring held an interesting meeting for the church, and quite a number were gathered into the fold. Brother Young was delighted at the culture of the audiences he addressed, and the fact that his Bible studies, prepared for Bible chair work, were well received and heard with uncommon pleasure. There is no doubt that a great future awaits the Fort Smith church. The officers are a fine body of men and aggressive in the business life of the community, and no finer body of women can be found in any church than in the church at Fort Smith, Ark.

Fort Smith has a population of 30,000 and is rapidly growing. To show its enterprise, a contract was recently let for paving over 50 miles of streets and for the sewering of the entire city now outside of the sewer district. A great jobbing business is carried on in this city, and large manufacturing plants are already at work. Fort Smith is the great eastern gateway into the new state of Oklahoma, and expects to reap great results from this strategic situation.

The brethren at Fort Smith are now getting ready to begin a second church, and a rural work a few miles south of the city seems to have a promising outlook. An assistant pastor is also one of the pressing needs of the church, which it is hoped will soon be provided.

It must not be taken that the enterprise of establishing a New Testament church in Manchester has been abandoned. The great daily meetings have temporarily concluded, but Brother Crerie, of Haverhill, Mass., is in Manchester safeguarding all that was gained during the past month, and soon as conditions warrant Brother Yeuell will return for a continuation of the meeting and, we doubt not, the organization of a church. We ought to have $1,250 by September 1 for this purpose. We appeal to the chivalry of our friends to help in the establishment of this first church in New Hampshire.

Among the faithful and consecrated members of the old historic church at Ravenna, O., were Brother Charles Judd and wife and their daughter, Mrs. Alvira Williamson. Last week the trustee of their estates, according to the terms of their wills, turned over to Hiram College the sum of $8,651; to the A. C. M. S. the sum of $2,133; to the Southern Christian Institute the sum of $734, and to the Ravenna Church of Christ six acres of land and the sum of $2,133.—M. E. Chatley, pastor.

A Call to the Churches from the Church Extension Board.

As the September offering for Church Extension is approaching, the churches should be preparing for it both in heart and purse. This offering is the chief source of income for the enlargement of our General Church Extension Fund.

No missionary society has a right to appeal to the brotherhood unless, first, it needs money to carry on its work, and, second, unless it is proving a worthy steward of the trust committed to its hands.

First—As to the need of funds. At the regular meeting of the Board of Extension on March 6 of this year it was decided to cease promising new loans until such time as the condition of our treasury would warrant it. After the terrible calamity at San Francisco a resolution was passed by our board to first help churches in and around San Francisco to rebuild, because we believed that was the wish of our brotherhood. Accordingly we granted $5,000 to help build a $10,000 church in Alameda, where many refugees are being cared for.

Another loan of $150 was granted Gladstone, N. D., because our board had never aided a church in North Dakota. Also a $2,500 annuity loan at 6 per cent. was granted Vinita, I. T. These are all the loans granted since our April meeting, and we now have requests on hand from 96 worthy churches, aggregating more than $125,000, distributed through 28 states and Canada, 10 of them being in California.

Never before in the history of our church extension work have there been so many appeals for aid as are now accumulated, just on the eve of our annual offering. Our receipts to July 31 show a gain of $12,393.10 over the same time last year. Over $5,000 of this gain is from the churches. In spite of this gain we cannot keep pace with the demands. We have never had such an era of church building among our missions as we have had this year, all of which is very hopeful for the permanency of our mission congregations. Our missions must build or they cannot hold what they have gained.

This exhibit of needs constituting 96 specific appeals for aid from March 6 to July 31 should be sufficient inspiration for churches to do their best in the forthcoming annual offering.

Second—Has your Board of Church Extension been a worthy steward? There is now something over $565,000 in the Church Extension Fund. Over $510,000 has been returned on loans and interest. This makes over $1,075,000 which the board has handled with the slight loss of only $563. This is greatly to the credit of the mission churches who have borrowed this money and your board deserves credit for wise business methods. The fund has built to July 31, 1906, 1,005 churches. Of this number over 470 have paid their loans in full. The Church Extension Fund has certainly made good, and deserves a liberal offering to help build these 96 churches at once.

One record we are not proud of. Last year only 1,108 churches as churches contributed to this work. One in 11. Is not this record a burning shame? We are now claiming to be a missionary people, and yet only one church in 11 sent an offering to church extension last year, and the amount the churches sent was only $18,516.96. This is an average of a little less than $17 per congregation contributing. Thus far the churches this year have sent over $5,000 more than last year. This is encouraging. It being the first of our four years' centennial campaign for the million dollars, it behooves the churches to stir themselves, because we must raise at least $100,000 a year if we are to reach the million by 1909. Forgetting the things that are behind, let us press forward and make a better record both in the number of contributing churches and the amount contributed.

Faithfully yours,
in behalf of the board,
G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec.

The Kentucky state convention of the Christian Church will be held in the First Church, Fourth and Walnut streets, Louisville, September 24 to 27, and it promises to be a convention of unusual interest. A railroad rate of one fare plus 25 cents for the round trip from all points in Kentucky has been secured and fully 2,000 delegates are expected to be in attendance. Some of the speakers are to be Miss Belle Bennett, president of the Methodist Home Missionary Society; Mrs. Helen E. Moses, Miss Ada Boyd, Bilaspur, India; President E. Y. Mullins, of the Baptist Theological Seminary; Marion Lawrance, secretary of the International Sunday-school Association; President B. A. Jenkins, of Kentucky University; President J. W. McGarvey, of the College of the Bible; H. D. Smith, of Hopkinsville; R. H. Crossfield, of Owensboro; Carey E. Morgan, of Paris; Miss Mary Finch, of Maysville, and H. D. Clark, of Mount Sterling. A general committee has been appointed representing the Christian churches of Louisville, with Robert M. Hopkins as chairman. Further information may be had by addressing him at the Keller building, Louisville. All persons who send in their names in advance will be furnished with lodging and breakfast free.

The Homeless Church.

The congregation without its own place of meeting is a family out in the street; a school without a building; a disembodied spirit; an egg without a shell. We have become so accustomed to the anomalous state in which two or three thousand of our congregations are constantly struggling to exist, that we are in danger of becoming indifferent to it. We are touched to the point of tears by the sight or even the story of an orphan child, and the feeling is a credit to our human nature, and an indication of the spark of divinity that abides within our hearts; but if we are moved by the homelessness of a human child—mere physical homelessness, how much more should we be stirred by the homeless condition of that divine child—a church of Christ! In its sad plight are involved the destinies of countless children. It is not a matter of comfort or happiness! it is a matter of life itself, and of life not for a few years but for eternity. Nothing more vital or fundamental is being undertaken in the centennial campaign than the increase of the church extension fund to $1,000,000 by 1909. This will not be sufficient to house all the homeless, but it will care for hundreds of the most desperate cases and will be a pledge to our Redeemer of our concern for the rest and our purpose to have fellowship with them in their need and to foster them into the strength that will glorify his name.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Illinois Notes.

The church at Watseka is taking on new life under the active ministry of W. S. Gamboe. He is recently from Kentucky, but seems to assimilate easily to his new conditions and the enterprises of his adopted state. This is most commendable. It is unfair for our churches to have to wait a year or two on a slow preacher to get into sympathy and cooperation with the great work which each state has in hand, simply because the preacher comes from another state. A bright future seems to be before the preacher and people at the beautiful town of Watseka.——Milford is a great field and P. Baker is filling the pulpit ably as he always does, and is justly loved for his consecration and wise counsel for the best and highest interests of the kingdom of God. Consecration to the work of the Master by its large and influential membership, would soon make a church of great power in the kingdom of God. This is the home of Brother Harmon, whose wife for a time was connected with the Orphans' Home in St. Louis. It is useless to say that they are fervent in the Lord's work. We regretted to miss Dr. Gillum, who had passed away this spring. He and Brother Harmon were valuable patrons and friends of Eureka College.——H. H. Peters has just resigned at Rossville to take up the work at Dixon. The Rossville church appreciate most highly his valuable services for the last eighteen months, during which time the church has rapidly grown and the Sunday-school has doubled. They have chosen his successor, who, we hope, will be able to carry forward the work without break, as but one Lord's day intervenes between the pastorates.——At Alvin the church is improving in various departments, under the six months' ministry of our young Bro. T. Z. Cummins. The church is comparatively young, has about one hundred members, with a Sunday-school enrollment of as many. This is a hard age on our young people. Sunday ball games and social functions are destroying their thousands. Endeavor work is often left out of the program, even by young people who would like to be counted for something in the community. But we trust a wiser spirit will prevail and that the better things will help to make such character, as will produce worthy and great men for the greatest age the world has ever seen.——I chanced to spend the night recently in the home of a young banker, who had married a rich man's daughter. On their center table were two Testaments, a Bible and the Sunday-school quarterlies. The family altar was a part of each day's program. I said in my heart, how blessed the people, and the day, when the children, whom the Lord has blest with means, shall consecrate themselves and theirs unto him.——At Danville our three strong men are at their post pushing the claims of the Master upon the hearts of the people. S. S. Jones, the veteran preacher of Danville, is strongly and justly intrenched in the hearts of the third church.——A. Scott is having some valuable additions to his flock in the Second church. His young people are proving a source of great strength as they always can, when they devote themselves properly to the Master's service.——Sorry to learn that J. H. Smart had resigned his work in Danville, where the church has grown so splendidly during his two years' ministry, more than 200 having been added. His talented wife is a most valuable aid to any church. He closes his work with September and should immediately be located where his unabated strength and large experience could have their full force. It is a great mistake to pass by our learned, vigorous and valuable men simply because a few "gray hairs their temples adorn."——The little church at Chrisman has the valuable services of J. A. Lytle one-fourth of the time. This is a fine field and we can build up a strong church here by united and consecrated service.——A. H. Harrell, living at Tuscola, preaches at Metcalf, Hume and Brockton. What possibilities there are in such a wide-spread pastorate in three splendid places. This is a very rich, fertile country, in which are situated these little cities. What a splendid field to start young preachers, to stir out young people for college out of which to make leaders of the world's life. We shall be disappointed if Brother Harrell does not discover some fine material in his territory.——Oakland is another preaching place of J. A. Lytle. It has It has 100 Disciples and 90 in Sunday-school. A fine field with a good preacher.——Another similar town is Hindsboro, where H. B. Easterling preaches half time and lives at Decatur. It has 10 Disciples and ninety in Sunday-school.——As these churches are samples of perhaps more than half the churches in the state I may be pardoned if I venture a few suggestions. The brethren would greatly enjoy a little more pastoral care. If the preachers could stay a day or two at each visit besides Sunday and visit among the people, get acquainted with the young people and strangers, and aliens and work up the Sunday-school and the young people's meeting, would it not be a great investment? The Lord's day when the preacher is absent may be most valuably used to develop the church's active ability. The trouble usually is that nobody makes any particular preparation. No program is prepared. Nobody is expected in particular to lead, so everything is spontaneous, haphazard, accidental, but not much to edification. Can not the preacher appoint a program committee, or at least leader; let him select persons to fill various parts in the program and give them time to prepare? Occasionally a sermon can be read, or selections, that would be instructive if some one was appointed to do it, who reads well and would take time to prepare well. Third, churches are suffering all over the state for want of fellowship in all the great enterprises of the church. The preacher visiting a church but once a month apologizes for not taking general offerings, by saying that half his visits would then be devoted to general offerings. The church apologizes by saying it is poor and has all it can do at home. What is to be done? What is the right thing to do? With what course will the Lord be pleased? What course would tend to the prosperity of the church? What course would make the church worthy of the Lord's blessing and promotion? "The liberal soul shall be made fat; he that watereth himself shall be watered again." "Give and it shall be given to you," etc. Do we believe these statements? Then practice them. Let every day of our offerings to public enterprises be faithfully observed. If they happen to come at the time of the regular visits of the minister, make the most of the day with his help. If it is not on his day let a program be prepared by the church. The various boards will furnish the necessary literature for a great program. Then the people according to their knowledge, generosity and ability will give and grow "fat" and the world will be blest with the Gospel. Lastly, go to church and attend to business. So many churches are nothing, if they have no preacher, no memorial of the Savior's love, no meeting for his praise and for the edifying of each other, no offering for his work. It is made a day of visiting, loafing, excursions. No wonder so many churches never grow strong. Come, brethren, the time is short, let us honor our high calling and do our duty while it is day, for the night cometh. Determine now to turn over a new leaf, and if a few will do this we will have a wonderful awakening in hundreds of churches. These are legitimate Illinois notes, for I am in Illinois, with Illinois conditions.

An Old and Well-tried Remedy

Bethany College.

The new interurban railway from Wellsburg to Bethany is an assured fact. President Cramblet has secured the necessary amount of money for its construction and service. Students may go home for the Christmas holidays on the "Wellsburg, Bethany, and Pittsburgh" traction line. This road has been needed for years, and will mean many more students in the coming year.

More rooms have been engaged for next year than ever before at this time of the year. Last year marked Bethany's highest enrollment, but this year's work will doubtless go far beyond it. The special expense proposition of the college should prove attractive to prospective students; $136 pays all expenses for the regular college student, while only $124 is charged for the ministerial students and the children of ministers and missionaries. This secures good comfortable quarters, good, wholesome food and all tuition and fees. Those desiring better service can secure the same at a reasonable rate. Many students from our well-to-do families are always in attendance.

Professor Johnson goes to Washington, D. C., and Old Virginia for his vacation. Professor Bourne is on the fifth tour of Europe. Professor Longanecker is in Ann Arbor and will spend the summer in Michigan. Professor Moos is in Canada. Professor Ellis is in Knoxville, Professor McEvoy in Pittsburg and President Cramblet is everywhere. It seems that Bethany college faculty is on wheels already.

The Sunday-school closed last week and all pronounced it a decided success. At the closing church service last Sunday evening three came forward to make the good confession, and Monday evening, "On the Banks of the Old Buffalo" at the baptismal service, a noble young man made the good confession. Our revival has begun, or rather, continues.

Mrs. Frank H. Main and family go to Atlantic City this week where they will be joined by Brother Main. Later they will go to Bethany Beach.

E. Lee Perry, of Pennsylvania, has been chosen financial secretary. He begins the campaign for the $100,000 endowment fund as a Centennial offering from the brotherhood for the mother college, founded by Alexander Campbell, aided by his father. This really should be made $250,000 before 1909, the Centennial of the "Declaration and Address," which marks the beginning of our movement for Christian union. Bethany College has done more for this, the greatest of all religious movements, than any other institution; why should it not be honored? If Bethany and the men she has trained were taken out of this movement little would remain. One hundred thousand dollars is a small expression of our gratitude. The endowment has now reached $200,000, counting productive property. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars more would enable her to continue her noble work for all time to come. I repeat this statement recently made about Bethany's work: "No institution in America for the same number of matriculates has turned out so many men of prominence."

A new addition to the town of Bethany has recently been laid out, and at least six new houses are building and will be erected this fall. Bethany is moving. We have other important news for the near future.—W .B. Taylor.

The Manchester Meeting.

To those who are accustomed to measure a meeting by the number of additions, this meeting may appear small; and, because the meeting closed without an organization being established, some might infer that the effort has been a failure. Nevertheless, it has been both a great and successful meeting. When Brother Yeuell arrived in Manchester he found that we were practically unknown, except by a few who counted us as a "narrow bigoted sect, always harping on baptism." Accordingly he was first treated with suspicion. Different means were employed to break up the meeting before it was a week old.

One minister chose for his text John 10:10, laying particular stress on that part which reads, "The thief cometh not but for to steal." But such opposition served only as seed to promote deeper interest in the meeting. The entire city began to feel the influence of the simple Gospel. They were amazed at the simplicity of the plea. Their interest increased with each service. They sat as one bewildered when their long cherished doctrines were brought under the light of the New Testament and proven false. Even then their sympathy was with the evangelist and the next service found them in the theater to learn still more about the perfect way.

One young school teacher deferred her trip to Denver, Col., so as to hear the truth as preached by Brother Yeuell.

The newspapers caught the spirit of the meeting and often published a column or more about it.

It is said by those who know that Mr. Yeuell is the greatest evangelist ever seen or heard in Manchester and his influence the best ever manifested. That don't look like a small meeting.

But why was there no church established during this meeting? It should be remembered that this meeting has not really closed. It has been thought best to discontinue the services for a while for several reasons. In the first place, the theater could not be rented and there was not a church that would open the doors for the meeting. It is out of the question to expect to organize a church in a theater in Manchester.

However, the first great thing has been done. The plea of the Disciples of Christ has gone deep into the hearts of scores of people. It is there to stay. In a hundred breasts this night in Manchester the grand old plea is throbbing with life. Who then shall say that an organization has not been started? Remember the law of growth, "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear."

The good work will go on; plans will be made whereby to keep our plea before the people, and then as soon as expedient we will have another great meeting in a building of our own. We may then expect to establish a representative church in Manchester. The churches there are dying under their worn out doctrines. Give them the bread of life and behold the results! Brethren, pray for New England.—Wm. C. Crerie, Haverhill, Mass.

REGIMENTAL REUNIONS AND FORTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY BATTLE CHICKAMAUGA,

CHATTANOOGA, SEPTEMBER 18-20, 1906.

On September 18, 1906, will occur the forty-third anniversary of the Battle of Chickamauga. It is proposed to celebrate this memorable event with a reunion of the various regiments that participated in this memorable battle and the various battles fought around Chattanooga. This reunion will be held at Chickamauga National Park, September 18, 19 and 20, and the present indications are that it will be the largest and most notable gathering ever held in the South. On the above dates, the remnants from the armies of twelve states, comprising the following: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Kentucky, will assemble, many for the first and last time since they marched from its blood-stained fields, forty-three years ago.

Here is one of the great opportunities for the education of the youth. Don't fail to take your children and show them historic Chattanooga, with all its historical connections. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Go and see the old war generals and other officers; point out the places of interest on the battlefield; let them show you and explain, in person, the markers erected on the battlefield showing the positions of the opposing armies at the time of battle. It will not be long until none will be left to do this noble work.

It will be many years, if ever again, that such an opportunity will present itself. See that your tickets read via the Louisville & Nashville R. R., the Battlefield Route. Call on your nearest railroad agent for rates and advertising matter pertaining to the reunion, or write nearest representative of the Louisville & Nashville R. R.

The Unity of Christians.

They are bitterly alive to their own levity, and rashness, and indiscretion, and precipitancy. With all honesty they dwell upon the excellent things that they are continually finding out in their rivals, and even in their enemies. And they are cold, and sceptical, and suspicious about the flattering things that are said concerning themselves among their too indulgent friends. They know better. Luther thus describes them: "They are of such true humility," says the Reformer, "that they never know that they have any humility themselves at all. Their humility is so tender and so exquisite that it cannot endure the sight of itself. Their humility, and their lowliness of mind are hidden with Christ in God." Let all those men who would put out a hand to bind up the long-standing wounds of the church be lowly-minded men, says the apostle. Let them be men of this measure of humility, that they esteem all other men to be better fitted for such a holy work than they are themselves.

And, then, as if all that were not enough, and as if to make such a universal reunion impossible in this world, the apostle still proceeds with his immense and his irreducible demands on all the proposers and all the promoters of union. "Look not every man on his own things," he insists, "but every man also on the things of others." An impossible demand again. For it is not in the Vatican, neither is it in Lambeth, and far less is it among ourselves in Scotland that such an assemblage of unearthly virtues and evangelical graces are to be found. We shall not see such a Union Committee of Churchmen constituted and co-operating for reunion, or for anything else, on this side the New Jerusalem. At the same time, let these tremendous tests of mind and heart and character continue to be applied to us all, till we are driven desperate with pain and with shame at ourselves. And, then, when by his grace to us, we are at last brought to that, the God of truth and love and peace will begin to get his work of truth and love and peace wrought by us. Let this heavenly legend then be written in letters of gold over every convocation and general assembly, and Episcopal and Presbyterian synod in the universal Church of Christ; this heavenly legend in letters of the purest gold. "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." "With all the fervor of his honest heart," writes Gardiner in his "Civil War," "Edmund Verney might pray for peace; but there was nothing in his conception of the situation which was at all like to hasten peace. To be a peacemaker, in any real sense of the word, requires the highest powers of the imagination. A peacemaker must have a clear and a sympathetic perception of that which is best and noblest on either side. And it was just in the perception of anything good or noble in Puritanism that Falkland and his associates were entirely lacking." * * * When we look not so much at our own short history, however brilliant to our own eyes that history may be; nor so much at our own peculiar attainments and possessions as Protestants and as evangelical believers, however precious and inalienable those attainments and possessions may be; but when we look more at the antiquity, and the nobility, and the grandeur, and the stateliness of those other churches, as over against the too great provincialism and rusticity and indecorum of speech and action that have often far too much characterized ourselves; when we have humbled ourselves to admit that some other churches have things of no small moment to teach us and to share with us, and things it will greatly enrich us to receive and to assimilate; when we are of a Christian mind enough to admit and even to welcome thoughts and views and feelings like these—then the day of a reconstructed Christendom will have begun to dawn, at least for ourselves. For then Ephraim shall not any more envy Judah, nor Judah any more vex Ephraim. Who is this that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners? Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitation; lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes. For thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles, and shall make the desolate cities to be inhabited. Amen; in God's good time it shall be seen!

[See editorial on this sermon.]

by local applications, as they can not reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

THE JUDGE, THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN.—Luke 18:1-14.

Memory Verses, 13, 14.

Golden Text.—God be merciful to me a sinner.—Luke 18:13.

The kingdom of God was a central conception in the teaching of Jesus. Probably the term always carried with it, to his less intimate hearers, a sense of the spectacular and political triumph of righteousness which he never intended. To the Jews of that time, the triumph of righteousness meant, in a very vivid and personal sense, the triumph of the righteous, and that meant the triumph of the Jews. So they were always ready to hear about the kingdom of God.

Some of the Pharisees had been asking when it would come. Perhaps they thought it too much trouble to be in a state of continual preparedness, but were willing to be on the lookout for the advent of the kingdom if they knew just when it would arrive. The substance of Jesus' answer to this question (Luke 17:27-37) was that no advantage was to be gained by knowing the hour of the supposed sudden advent of the kingdom, for it was an internal and spiritual matter. "The kingdom of God is within you." The only way into the kingdom is by the possession of spiritual qualifications. It will not help to be at a given place at a given time. When the spiritual criterion is applied, persons closely allied and alike in all external respects (two men in one bed, or two women grinding at one mill) may be separated, one in the kingdom and one out of it.

In this same connection Jesus spoke the parable of the judge and the widow. The judge was a poor representative of his profession. He cared for neither law nor equity. But the persistence of the widow finally wore him out and she gained her cause. Such is to be the perseverance in prayer of those who seek the kingdom, and a wise and loving father will certainly be no harder to entreat than was the harsh judge.

In all matters pertaining to the spiritual life—in prayer and in seeking entrance to the kingdom of God, it is the steady and constant effort that counts. Jerks and spurts have little value in religion. Religion is so truly vital, that it can flourish only through the vital processes of nurture and growth. These processes take time, and whatever takes time requires patience and persistence.

The parable of the Pharisee and the publican, the arrogance and conceit of the one and the humility of the other, is one of the most precious things in the New Testament. The parable was spoken to Pharisees. It was not only about these religious aristocrats, but was actually spoken "unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous." Jesus always delivered his teaching to the people most nearly concerned.

The characters of these two men represent the contrast between a regime of law and a dispensation of grace. Dependence solely upon obedience to law in overt acts for salvation has for its natural product the hard, cold, correct and self-satisfied individual who keeps the law as the price which he must pay for salvation, as the rogue may pay his debts to keep out of jail. It means formally correct conduct without character. Law, as a means for saving the human race, was weak and unsatisfactory not only because perfect obedience was humanly impossible, but because the nearer one came to perfect obedience the greater was his danger of falling into a loveless egotism which is ruinous to character.

It was not the publican's sins, but his humility and contrition that won commendation. Humility without sin is better. But the sin which leaves a man penitent and humble and conscious of his need of grace, has not been without its saving influence.

WHAT IS THE SIN OF PHARISEEISM.—Luke 11:42-44.

"God beholds thee, wretch, though wrapped in prayer,
A wolf disguised, a painted sepulchre;
Regards no more thy cant, and godly whine,
Than yon dumb statue, on the marble shrine,
Whose hands are seen, in holy rapture closed
And steadfast eyes,, to heaven alone disposed,
Prayer's senseless image, where no soul within Speaks through the form and animates the mien."

In this "woe" Jesus is not decreeing a penalty on Phariseeism, but predicting it. In the very nature of things the denouement of their scrupulous attention to cleansing the outside of the platter and neglecting the inside, of tithing anise and ignoring the moralities of the law would be disaster to their happiness, fatality to their worth, and involve them in woes innumerable.

Self-justification is a prominent trait of Phariseeism. It is a bar to righteousness—a state unattainable save through repentance. The Pharisee can not be penitent, for seen through his eyes of spiritual pride he has done no wrong. Let us pray that our motives and actions may appear to us as they do to God, and that with penitential tears we may keep our lives white as they were once made in Jesus' blood.

The rewards of Phariseeism are not full compensation for its pains. It requires an effort to affect Christian character. If that effort to counterfeit were directed toward becoming a genuine Christian, it might not make one a very illustrious Christian, but it would be a positive step in the right direction, it would be an acquisition having real, even though small, value. All that tempts us into Pharisaical attempts to seem better than we are are Satan's promises—made to be broken, apples of Sodom that turn to dust at our eager touch.

A vast majority of those really desiring to be good get their ideals of God and goodness from what they see the reputed religious doing rather than from studying Christ and meditating on "what would Jesus do?" Here is a measure of the responsibility devolving upon sharers in the faith of God. Phariseeism, with its shoddy, hollowness and conceit and its pretensions of knowledge and piety designed to deceive the unlearned conveys very imperfect and distorted conceptions of these themes. For these perversions Phariseeism, ancient and modern, will be held to account.

Since Phariseeism was the most superior religious cult in Israel, how great was the need of spiritual regeneration in that devoted land; how apparent to the thoughtful that unless a Savior came the hopes of the nation would be despoiled by the almost all-prevailing hypocrisy, cant and make-believe! Society was honeycombed with deceit, there was no public confidence, religion was a scoff, character had no vitality, complete demoralization was near. Phariseeism demonstrated for all time that outward respectability, scholasticism, the observance of religious forms, and pride of caste can not preserve a people from decline, or human nature from demoralization.

The old rheumatic's piously sacrificing the excitement of the dance "for the love of the blessed cause"; the churl inwardly longing for the banquets from which his unlovely disposition has exiled him, but unctiously warning the youth of the demoralizing effects of society and pointing to himself as one who has resisted its blandishments, are fine exhibitions of Phariseeism not unseen today. There would have been virtue in giving up the dance at the behest of conscience, but not on rheumatism's edict. There is divine approval of voluntarily withdrawing from the meaningless rounds of fashionable idleness, but none in reluctant acquiescence in society's withdrawal from you.

THE OLD LIFE AND THE NEW.—Romans 6:3-7.

"Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings;
  Thy better portion trace;
Rise, from transitory things,
  Toward heaven thy native place.

"Sun and moon, and stars decay;
  Time shall soon this earth remove;
Rise, my soul, and haste away
  To realms prepared above!"

The old life was of the earth and earthy, the new life is come down from heaven and is heavenly. The muck-rake is symbolic of one, the telescope of the other. If there is not much of heavenliness in us let us re-examine the foundations of our faith, the sincerity of our repentance, the reality of our fellowship in the death and life of our Redeemer. The trouble is with the man, and not with the divine plan.

The fourth verse is a grave in which we may bury, and ought to deeply bury, all incertitudes and disputations concerning the form of Christian baptism. Submersion in water, immersion alone meets the requirements of this portrayal and of the beautiful, instructive and prophetic symbolism of the rite. If the energy devoted to polemics about baptism were devoted to create desire and make preparation for it, more would be saved. Some day all disputation concerning this will give place to the voice of exhortation.

Christ died unto sin once. He took our sins upon himself once and then disposed of them forever. Having died unto sin, that is, having separated himself from it, "he liveth unto God." It should be so with us. The trouble with us is we do not extirpate sin from our lives, root and branch. Enough remains after our frequent reconsecrations to get another start. Of us it ought to be said, "Having died unto sin once, he liveth unto God." Let us cease blending these livings and dyings. Let us henceforth live only.

We really lost nothing in relinquishing the old life. None that has lived for it alone believes its games are worth their candles; what seems like roses are thick-set with thorns; and portentous clouds veil all but glimpses of the blue empyrean. But we no sooner begin cultivating the higher affinities of the new life than they whisper of a paradise without a tempter, of songs having no weeping tremolo, of hillsides never cleft by the sexton's spade, of an eternity through which we live in an ever-ascending scale, till in a sense earth can not conceive we become God-like.

One may undergo burial in water and yet not be dead to sin nor rise to walk in newness of life with Christ. But if one is prepared for baptism—if he has heard and learned of Christ and attained unto vital faith in him as the Son of God, and has in all sincerity repented of his sins, renounced them and made restitution for them so far as he could, and has honestly confessed Jesus before men to be his Savior, then he will leave his sins and sinful nature in the grave and come forth a new man in Christ, and sin will no more have dominion over him. If we were not so prepared for baptism let us do again the first works, and the blessing of freedom from the old man of sin will come to us even years this side of the grave where we should have been separated from his service.

Before we were risen with Christ it was fitting we should be largely concerned about our adjustment to conditions affecting our physical welfare—food, clothing, shelter, sanitation. We were deeply interested in our social relations, too—good neighbors, schools, entertainment, and laws securing equity and protecting life and property. But now that we are risen with Christ, they seem like inferior relations. We are more concerned now to harmonize our lives with higher relationships—to have our souls fed with the "bread of life," to keep in tune with the infinite, to feel ourselves preparing for the companionship of angels and the redeemed forever. When adjusting our physical and social selves to their best environment we are tuning the bass and tenor of our lives to the universal concord, but not till we come to these spiritual relations are we harmonizing the soprano and all the highest and sweetest notes of our life music.

That New York Resolution.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

Although not a member of the New York Ministerial association, I was present at its last annual meeting held in Elmira and listened to the temperate discussion that preceded the adoption of the resolution sent you for publication, and found on page 907 of the July 19 issue of your most excellent paper. I therefore confidently believe I am capable of rightly judging the situation. I frankly admit that I am utterly unable to perceive any "ambiguity" in the resolution. On the contrary, it seems to be clear and positive in its meaning, and expressed in language easily comprehended, containing no subtle or hidden purpose. What you think it "probably" means is precisely what it does mean. The ministers of the Empire state are unquestionably sound on the federation question, and when they find it necessary to do so, are abundantly able to give their beliefs an expression that will be equally as clear as their resolution, which seems to have been a disturbing element in your editorial shop.

Your comments on the resolution seems to imply that the claimed "ambiguity" consists in what the resolution does not state rather than what it does express! If this be true, it must be a new species of "higher criticism" that has strayed beyond all reasonable bounds, and needs to be called home, effectively spanked, poulticed and sent to bed, there to remain until a suit of swaddling clothes can be prepared for its next appearance. Something is likely to happen that will damage its anatomy if this is not done.

And you err in declaring that "only one thing is clear from the resolution," and that is the fear of "heated discussion." You have no more right to read that into the resolution than the assertion that these good ministers see the folly of not giving God a chance to adjust and settle a few questions in his own righteous way, unaided by, and independent of his restless, impatient, frail and recalcitrant children.

There is as much faith in God and trust in the brethren in New York state as in any other locality, but appearances would seem to justify the conclusion that the quality of the former is slightly superior because of the willingness of the Empire state brethren to supplement their faith and confidence in God with a liberal use of wisdom, prudence and consecrated common sense. Let us indeed keep clear heads and steady nerves, not forgetting the wisdom dispensed by that Jerusalem Doctor of Law which has not up to the present suffered any improvement.

Buffalo, N. Y. A. B. KELLOGG.

[The foregoing requires only a brief word of comment.

1. We must not allow our correspondent to place us in seeming opposition to the Ministerial Association of New York. What we understood them to mean by their resolution—and Brother Kellogg says we were right in our understanding—we had previously recommended, so that brings us into substantial unity. The only "ambiguity" attached to the resolution was in the use of the word "Convention," since a proposition had been made to have a separate convention for the consideration of some matters which it was not considered expedient to bring before the regular convention. We inferred they meant the regular convention, and had no thought of any "subtle or hidden purpose" in the resolution.

2. We have no doubt that the New York ministers, in common with all the brethren, "see the folly of not giving God a chance to adjust and settle a few questions in his own righteous way," but we should not charge them with holding to the view that we were excluding God from any problem by seeking, as far as we know, to do his will. On the contrary we are justified by our critic himself in inferring rather that the brethren of the empire state believe in "supplementing their faith and confidence in God, with a liberal use of wisdom, prudence and consecrated common sense." This was what, in our weak and stumbling way, we were trying to do.

Dr. Gamaliel's advice, it should be remembered, was given not to the friends but to the opponents of Christianity, and it is very wise advice now for those who oppose federation, or the systematic co-operation, as far as possible, of all Christians; but it does not apply to the believers in Christ and Christianity, nor to the advocates of Christian union and of co-operation as a step thereto, as respects their duty to a cause which they have no doubt is "of God." It is the duty, however, of the advocates of every righteous cause to use wisdom in its advocacy, and to exercise great patience with those who are mistakenly opposed to it. In this, we need not say, we are in perfect agreement with our esteemed correspondent. We depend too little upon God and too much upon ourselves in settling aright the great questions which have to do with the progress of his kingdom.—EDITOR.]

MARRIAGE. By Jane Dearborn Mills. Philadelphia, The Nunc Licet Press. Pages 82. Price 50c.

This book is written from the woman's standpoint and is due to the demand for a previously written book circulated privately. The present work has been entirely rewritten and added to. It holds up a high ideal of the marriage relationship and has a word on its purity, its service, "the marriage of the unmarried," and marriage laws.

THE AWAKENING OF HELENA RICHIE. By Margaret Deland. Illustrated by Walter Appleton Clark. (Harper Brothers, publishers, New York. ($1.50.)

Helena Richie is a new arrival among the delightful Old Chester people of Mrs. Deland's earlier stories. About her young widowhood there is mystery for Old Chester, but there is a loneliness for her and self centeredness blighting a splendid quality of mind and heart. Her redemption comes through the adoption of little David, who to the end of the story fairly divides the reader's interest with the heroine. Affection for her ward overcomes self love and makes of her a true priestess in the great temple of humanity.

DEMOCRACY IN THE CHURCH. Bv Edgar L. Heermance (The Pilgrim Press, Chicago. $1.25 net.

As intimated in the title, this is a discussion of church polity. It ranges from the sentiment, "We must become more compact, if we are to do our work in the kingdom. Consolidation is the tendency of the age,"—to that other and apparently equally popular clamor, "Centralization is the sale of our birthright. What is wanted is not a change of system but a change of heart." The author's apology for writing at this time is the world-wide desire for Christian unity, and he regards the book as particularly opportune in view of moves recently made toward union between Congregationalists, United Brethren, and Methodist Protestants. It is an analytical study of the organization and government of the apostolic church and a strong protest against departure from the Jerusalem model. Among the prominent assertions stoutly maintained is that the ancient democracy in the church (as opposed to ecclesiasticism) means the continuous leadership of the Spirit.

SMITH.

Jessie Golden Smith died March 29, 1906, at St. Elmo, Ill., aged 2 years, 3 months and 19 days. Her Christian parents now have a lamb in the upper fold where Jesus leads and they never grow old. N. A. WALKER, Minister.

DEWEY.

Mrs. Julia M. Dewey, oldest of three children of Alvan and Sophia Waite, was born Feb. 16, 1829, died July 16, 1906. Her husband, Wilson Dewey, died about 19 years ago. Two sons, Alvan and Walter, and one daughter, Clara, have also preceded her to the better land. Two daughters, Mrs. Ella Pelton and Mrs. Ida Hughes of Willoughby, and one brother, Henry C. Waite, now of Chicago, survive her, all of whom were present at the funeral services held on Tuesday afternoon at the residence of her son-in-law, Mr. John Pelton, where she had made her home for the last few years. Her pastor, J. C. B. Stivers had charge of the services. The body was taken to Waite Hill cemetery for burial.

Mrs. Dewey's father, Alvan Waite, was an elder and preacher among the Disciples, whose mantle has fallen upon his grandson, Claire L. Waite, now pastor of the Church of Christ at Milwaukee, Wis. Alvan Waite was one of the pioneer Disciples of "The Western Reserve," contemporary with the Haydens, Hartzells, Joneses, Clapps, Mosses and others, in the days of Thomas and Alexander Campbell, many of whom, in her young life, Mrs. Dewey had assisted in entertaining at her father's home. Therefore her death marks the departure of one more of the few remaining early Disciples whose knowledge of the events of those days does not depend solely upon recorded history, and ends a most faithful earthly life of more than 60 years of Christian service—which began with the church on Waite Hill, Ohio, and closed with the church in Willoughby village. The church has lost a most worthy member, the community a kind unselfish neighbor, the family a devoted, affectionate, refined mother. During years when sorrows crowded fast upon each other, bereft of life's companion and children, her unfaltering faith in her God was most inspiring. All through long years of life's joys and sorrows her Bible was her daily source of strength, instruction and consolation.

The Stepmother.

BY KATHLEEN KAVANAUGH.

Within a fortnight of my birth
My fair young mother passed from earth,
And Memory left to me no trace
Of her dear form or face.
In time another took her place:

The one who led me down the years,
Who kissed away all fret and tears,
Upon whose warm, responsive breast,
Whenever care oppressed,
I always found relief and rest.

It is my hope I'll see them stand
At heaven's gate, clasped hand in hand,
The mother sweet I never knew,
The one tried, noble, true,
Who filled her place—my mother, too.

The Bronze Vase.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

PART III.

CHAPTER VI.

Never as at that moment had Wizzen's dry, wrinkled face seemed so friendly, or his black shirt and blue cotton trowsers so homelike, or his glazed cap so grateful. Raymund and Rhoda could almost have embraced him upon the spot, they were in such desperate strait and he had such an air of helpfulness. "This is certainly a surprise to me," said Wizzen, who was chewing tobacco, and who, having his own ideas about the proprieties in the presence of ladies, sought to conceal the fact.

"Wizzen," said Raymund, speaking rapidly, "some wicked people have invented a story about Rhoda to get her in their power, and they are hunting us at this minute. We are running away, but we don't know where to run to! Help us, Wizzen, we are in dreadful trouble."

"Come on," said Wizzen briskly, and without waiting for another word, he bolted down an alley, brought them upon a rough road that skirted a high bluff, and held his quid in his cheek with the resolute determination of a man who would run over and drown himself before he would afflict the feelings of a lady who could have no sympathy in his tobacco. Rhoda, seeing his danger, ostensibly turned her head to gaze at the shanties perched on the summit of the bluff; when she turned about Wizzen had gotten rid of his quid and was himself again. "I want to show you something mighty pretty," he said pursing up his mouth and wrinkling his eyes hard. At the first turning he pointed out a mover's wagon, to which were hitched his two hard-worked horses. The horses did not seem so feeble as when the young people had known them, but they had no extra strength to boast of. "Pile right into that there wagon," said Wizzen heartily, "and they won't nobody find you; and I'll git on the front seat and take you where it will be as safe as an ant in an anthill." They obeyed with spirits of thanksgiving. The canvas covering was drawn tight on all four sides, and as Wizzen sat on the front seat, outside of this roofing and walls of white security, they could see him only as a vague blur as he drove along.

"How delightful this is!" said Rhoda, staring about her, as the wagon slowly moved forward, creaking and rattling and grinding in a complaining tone about its axles. "Why don't you grease us?" the axles inquired, and with reason enough. Raymund and Rhoda found themselves in a romantic room of cloth which in a way reminded the youth of the labyrinth in the Hands' House, the night of his thirteenth birthday. Ah, what would Nelsie Loraine have thought of this canvas-apartment? How common and ridiculous such a chamber must appear to the millionaire's daughter, now about to start upon her European tour! No matter. It was neither common nor ridiculous to Raymund.

At the end of the wagon farthest from the driver's seat, was a little erect coal stove, which took up but small space; the pipe ran from it up through the canvas, where one of the oaken arches spanned from side to side. There was just room between the back of the stove, and the sideboard, for a coalbucket, and there the coalbucket stood. Fortunately there was no fire in the stove, for the June morning was already oppressively warm. Next the stove was placed a spring wagonseat, with a quantity of straw all about it, for one's feet. There were cushions on the low seat, and the jarring of the wagon was partly counterbalanced by the give of the springs. In one corner was piled a quantity of bedclothes, in another, several large pine boxes, and opposite the spring wagon seat, which ran lengthwise of the wagonbed, was a little gasoline stove, and a tall metal trunk. In the corner opposite the stove was a plain but substantial table, and fastened upon it in an inverted position was another table, its legs in the air. Everything was tied to its place by ropes, except the stove, which was heavily wired. By cautiously drawing up the canvas in the rear, they could look into a long narrow box, nailed to the end of the wagon, and covered by a sloping lid to keep out the rain. In this box, Rhoda divined, were the cooking vessels; beneath the box swung a wooden bucket, and a large tin basin. Rhoda was so enthusiastic over the moving palace, that she climbed to the front and drew aside the flap to compliment Wizzen; but finding him enjoying his tobacco in a hearty, open-mouth way that spoke of a sense of utmost security, she gave up her intention.

The mover's wagon traveled along roads that grew rougher and rougher. The wheels no longer ground over uneven pavements, and there was all the time a downward slant that showed the advantage of having the stove wired to its place. On each side were little flaps which could be opened to serve as windows; but the young people, not caring to expose their faces to the enemy, should Boggs be in pursuit, did not often take advantage of this privilege. They saw enough, however, to tell them that they were leaving the city and advancing along the grassless, sandy wastes of the river bottom. At last the wagon stopped. It had frequently done this before on account of the unwillingness of the horses to keep to their business. As Wizzen once called back through the canvas, "These here hosses is like me; they don't keer for no unbroken work." But now the wagon stopped because it had reached the end of the journey. Wizzen dismounted and drew up the end-flap, assuring his passengers that it was quite safe for them to dismount.

They found themselves in the midst of a wild and desolate scene. Not very far away ran the muddy Missouri, and all about, stretched the flat sandy waste, littered with wreckage from the last overflow. Broken doors, decayed window-casings, rusty wheels, rotting planks, tangled wire, discolored telephone poles were all jumbled together in different heaps. Here and there stood a stranded house-boat, its flat deck converted into a porch. Wizzen had checked his horses before a passenger-coach which the river had swept from a submerged track and had hurled hither in its mad fury. The coach was half buried in the sand. Only the top and one side was visible.

"Here's home," said Wizzen. "Me and Mrs. Weed has been living here nigh on a month, till I could git ready for our overland voyage."

Even as he spoke, the door of the coach opened and Mrs. Weed, now seventy-eight years old, but still active, looked out at them. She recognized Rhoda and Raymund at once and waved her knitting genially. "Come right in," she cried. "Our house is mighty high but you won't mind that, I reckon."

"She means low," said Wizzen admiringly. "I tell you, my mother-in-law gets sprier ever' day. And I don't keer what words she lays hold on, I kin ginerally grapple onto what she means. It's a sorter gift on my part I reckon."

"Come right in!" urged the old lady, who could not hear a word they said.

"We'll go in," said Wizzen. "I'll just leave my hosses standing which they wouldn't move nohow, unless the river riz an' washed 'em away. I found this here pazzenger-coach buried out here in the sand, an' not wanting to pay no rent which it is only fair to say I never do, for I feel that as to paying rent, you ain't gitting nothing as to say it is your own which is what I want when paying out. So I taken my shovel and dug away the windows on one side, and cleaned out this hole to git to the door, and I plunked old Mrs. Weed down there where what with the June sun a brilling down on the iron roof so stiddy, she ain't never oncet called for a fire. But now I've bought ever-thing I want for our trip, and only to-night it is my mind to pull out."

"O Wizzen!" cried Rhoda as they bowed their heads to enter, "do take us with you! Where are you going?"

"Bee-line for St. Louis," said Wizzen. They seated themselves upon seats which had once been splendid in blue velvet upholstery, but which had long since lost their form and color.

"How romantic!" Rhoda could not help exclaiming, as she looked down the aisle, dusty and forlorn and read above the wrecked door the warning, "NO SMOKING!"

Raymund said eagerly, "Wizzen, let us go with you! Our uncle is in St. Louis, and maybe if we come face to face with him, he won't send us away. Anyway, we might as well be there as anywhere, and if we try to leave Kansas City by the train, we are afraid Boggs will arrest Rhoda. I have some money with me, and can help pay for our expense. And oh, Rhoda, and I always wanted to go across the country in a covered-wagon, didn't we, Rhoda!"

His appealing to her was so like his childhood way that Rhoda beamed upon him with tender affection. "Of course we always did. Don't you remember, Wizzen, how we stole off to your house to beg you once to help us?"

"And don't you remember," said Wizzen, "how I told you that a dozen years from then, you'd forget all about your present troubles. Well, three years only has passed and now you've forgot them troubles, and is bothering over new 'ones! I tell you life is a strange thing which the more of it I git the more it seems so to me."

"Henry," said Mrs. Weed, "don't you think it is time for us to sleep?"

"She means to eat," said Wizzen, "for we ain't had no breakfast yet; and as to her calling me Henry, that is just her vagary." Then taking the old lady's ear-trumpet, he bawled into it, "I'll go and git breakfast now. These children—" Wizzen added in a lower voice, "no need to tell her your names, young folks, for if they went into one of her ears, which it is only fair to say is more than unlikely, it wouldn't git ketched in her brain long enough for her to use 'em oncet." Wizzen then raised his voice: "These is my friends, Mrs. Weed, friends—do you hear?"

"Yes," said the old lady, nodding and smiling. "If that's so, they're my friends, too."

"They want to go with us along to St. Louis. Any objection, Mrs. Weed?"

"Reflection?" said Mrs. Weed.

"No, Mrs. Weed, objection, ob—jec—tion?"

"Do they shun me?" asked the old lady in a pained voice. "Why young people, I am very glad to have you here, as you are Henry's friends!"

"She never called me Henry before," said Wizzen, nodding to Rhoda. "It's wonderful where she gets all these names and words. He raised his voice and explained to Mrs. Weed, who heartily seconded Wizzen's permission; so it was decided upon the spot that the orphans should make the "overland voyage," from Kansas City to St. Louis."

Father, we thank thee for the night,
And for the pleasant morning light;
For rest, and food, and perfect care,
And all that makes the day so fair.

Advance Society Letters.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

But I was telling you about our orphan Charlie's vacation, and didn't get through. During the Chautauqua we were invited to eat dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Burris, who had brought their dinner to the tent. We decided to eat on the platform, where there was a small speaker's table, so we spread out the picnic dinner on the table—or rather, we doubled it up, as the table wasn't large enough for spreading. It was fun to eat on the great rostrum in the big deserted tent, knowing that in about two hours Sam Jones would be speaking in that very spot to a great multitude. I greatly regret to have to tell you that orphan Charlie dropped his plate on the floor with his chicken under the plate. Perhaps I might have spoken a friendly word of caution and advice to him about it, had I not dropped my own plate about that time. I dropped my plate because the table was so small, but don't know why Charlie was so careless. When the dinner was ended, there were marks on the floor where we had sopped our chicken, and a little later you ought to have seen the flies! Sam Jones had to stand right amongst them to lecture, and if he said some pretty hard things about Arkansas, maybe the flies were partly to blame. . . . Charlie had a buggy ride while in Bentonville. There were ever and ever so many nice people with buggies who might have taken him, but Miss Nana Wood is the young lady who did take him. He also went to the Endeavor society and read his Bible verses clearly and correctly and without having to be begged. . . . He went on two picnics while here. The crowd on both occasions consisted of the same dramatis personae (I trust I am spelling my Latin in Roman form); it consisted of my young friend, Roy Dixon and myself. That only seems to be two, yet I am sure there were three—why, bless me! yes: there was Charlie himself. Of course that makes three. Our first picnic consisted of going a mile afoot to Park Springs over torn-up sidewalks and under very hot Arkansas sun, throwing rocks (of which there was an abundance) at trees, candy, pecans (very old pecans) and almonds (very dry almonds). The way you do is this: You take a marshmallow, stick a pecan kernel in each corner, stick a large chocolate-drop on top of the kernels, stick an almond-kernel on top of the building, for a chimney (by this time it is quite sticky) open your mouth very wide, not as if you were going to say "o," but as if you were going to cry double-o, and then, what? Put it in your mouth, of course: not just sit there looking at it. Then you throw a rock at a tree. It was a very good picnic. . . . The second picnic, however, was perhaps more enjoyed. True we did not go so far and did not get so hot, but there were enough other troubles to make it seem picknicky. You go along a certain street as if you were not expecting to get any place in particular, when of a sudden you come to the mouth of a walled-in alley that runs dark and narrow, and seems to stop at a board fence and try to get back; but when you reach the board fence you find a mysterious turn, and the alley runs away and never stops till it reaches a wood with soft grass and forest trees and a cow that somebody has staked out for supper. So orphan Charlie and Roy and I took dominoes and peanuts and cheap, very cheap, candy that smelt like the clothes of the young man who clerks in the drugstore, and also some real expensive candy, some perfectly extravagant chocolate-drops, the five for a nickel variety in a small town. But wait, you haven't heard the climax. We took Iron Brew, Lemon Sour and Dr. Pepper. In this park there were no water works, and feeling sure we'd get thirsty after the candy course, we took three soda pops, whose names were as given. After we had almost played the spots off the dominoes, we prepared to pop our pop. As we did not know the relative merits of Iron Brew, Lemon Sour or Dr. Pepper, we wrote the initials of each pop on separate slips of paper and cast them in the air, with the understanding that the man must take the pop whose name fell closest to him. Well, "L. S." fluttered closest to me; "I. B." fell to the lot of Roy Dixon, and Charlie swooped upon "D. P." The next thing was to open our bottles. They weren't the kind you slap down to make fizz, but the flat silver (likely enough only plated) smooth mouthed bottles that need a twister. We didn't have a twister, but there was a barbed-wire fence near, which we pounded at with our bottles. Finally Roy got off his top before he thought it was coming, and his Iron Brew shot into his eye. We cried to him to clap the neck of his bottle into his mouth, but it was throwing Iron Brew in such a steady stream that he was blinded and couldn't find his mouth. About that time Charlie whacked off his top triumphantly and drank his Dr. Pepper with a bleeding hand. I had no other mishap than to drink my Lemon Sour to the last drop. Lest any one think this an advertisement, I will add that, judging from my internal sensation and the pallid faces of my friends as we filed down the alley homeward, these three pops are equally to be avoided. Does some one ask, "What is all this about Lemon Sour and Iron Brew in my religious paper?" But consider, friend, which is more religious —to make a speech about brotherly love at a prayer-meeting, or to scatter a little Lemon Sour and Dr. Pepper into some life that needs a friend?

I am writing this on the last day of July, but when you read it, you will be bowling along through the hot, dusty highway of August. Just now I am all excitement. My ice cream social, to which every one of you is invited, comes off August 3—only three more days. I wonder if we will take in much money for Charlie's education? If any of you forgot about it, you might send on for a dish of our ice cream—it hasn't melted yet. Now, what dress shall I wear? I am sure I would not look right all in white. By the way, I have received some advance orders for reserved seats at the table. Since Charlie left here for his sister's, I have heard from him. He writes: "I got here all right yesterday, at about two o'clock. Bessie was delighted with the locket." (This is the gold locket Mrs. Rothwell, of Moberly, Mo., gave Charlie to give his little sister. It contains Charlie's photograph, taken here, and a real good one.) "It has been raining here ever since I came. Bessie has a very nice home here. Could you send me the last Christian-Evangelist? I don't want to miss any of 'The Bronze Vase.' How are 'L. S.,' 'I. B.' and 'D. P.?' Tell Roy I said 'Hello.'" I have received a beautiful illustrated post-card which informs me that our Grace Everest is at Grand Lake, Col.: "I came here Sunday and will stay about a month. This picture of Moffat Line above Bowlder Park represents one of the beautiful places we have seen. I have not forgotten the Av. S." From M. T. D., Hannibal, Mo., comes this: "To help make Mrs. Shryock's prayer come true, I send $5 for Drusie, $5 for Charlie. I have just cut out the Evening Prayer at the head of the Av. S. Letters of May 21, and shall send it to my daughter, who, I hope, will receive it in the steamer on which, God willing, she will shortly sail home from Europe. I have watched with interest for years the work of the Av. S. and its supplemental work, that of supporting an orphan and missionary. God alone knows the great results that may come of it all." (It seems good to hear a friendly voice from the city in whose shadow I was born. The letter contains a prayer for me, too personal for print, and I wouldn't mention it at all except to point my remark. The remark is this: Every now and then a letter comes with the sweetest wishes and the dearest prayers, from grandmothers and grand-children—somebody else's grandmothers and grand-children, you understand—people I've never seen. Now suppose I had spent my life making money, buying cattle, let us say, or controlling railroads and saving, saving. Hannibal wouldn't care whether I'd been born or not. I wouldn't be anything to anybody except just to kinfolks and myself. So let's be happy and poor, and give away something of the little that's left.)

Ruth Day, Sparta, Mo.: "I intended naming July 4th as the day for the fried chicken eating, but put it off till too late. But come any time; there will be plenty of chickens later on." (Yes, but a chicken that's "later on" has to be boiled instead of fried.) "I would have been glad to celebrate with Donnie Swift, down at Billings, but it is most too far from home. I am glad Charlie is getting to stay and see his sister Bessie on his way home. I hope he will have as nice a time from the city as I do when I visit my aunt in the city. I hope those orphans in the 'Bronze Vase' can manage somehow so they can live together. I enclose 20 cents for Charlie and Drusie and wish it could be as many dollars. I must go feed my chickens." (Don't forget to put some water in that pan.) B. Roth, Ness City, Kan.: "I want to ask your opinion on chain letters as a means of collecting money for benevolent purposes. I received one from Neptune, Kansas. They are unpopular among my friends, so I took some names I found in the Advance Society. Do you think it was an imposition, especially as some of them were from Missouri? I become more and more interested in the Av. S. My son is a Christian preacher." (When my opinion is solicited, I tell exactly what I think, and what I think about chain letters is that they ought not to be. I used to feel differently about them. I used to get a chain letter in a big stack of mail, when I would have to write till my eyes were burning and my tongue dry and my hands tired. Then I would open the chain letter. It would begin, "Dear Mr. Breck—I have been asked to write," etc.; and then it would go on, "Please make 10 copies of this letter to your friends, requesting each to write ten, that no link may be broken." Incidentally it would ask me to send a dime, and to ask my ten unsuspecting friends to send each a dime, and for them to ask their poor acquaintances to send their hundred dimes, etc. When I was a babe to chain letters, I was so afraid a link would be broken that I would toil over those ten copies when I could have been using my time in a useful and pleasant manner. And I am confident my friends, if they read those copies, had a grudge against me when they saw my name signed. I got to thinking, "This chain will be broken in the course of time; why not snap a link right here?" So I did, but I felt bad about it. Not so, now. Now, I love to break chain letters. I feel I am doing the world a good turn. I say boldly that I am a Chain Letter Smasher. Look here: If any chain letter remained unbroken, and if it only called for a two-cent stamp, in a short time it would capture all the stamps in the world. It's asking too much. It's selfish to want millions of dollars for one particular cause. It doesn't leave anything for other causes. Some chain letters ask for prayers instead of money. Then it's "Write to 10 of your friends to pray for a certain thing, and ask each of them to write to 10 more, but if you can not do this, kindly return this letter so no link will be broken." I believe in prayer; but I think the 20 cents I'd spend in mailing my 10 copies would do the certain thing more good than putting 10 people out of patience because you've asked them to write 10 letters. So I put that request in my waste basket, and I break my link and feel good about it, and I think of my 10 friends to whom I have NOT written, and I am happy. Now, that is my opinion of chain letters. It may not be worth anything to other people, but it's mighty handy to me.) Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo.: "I wish some of the Av. S. would try this plan mamma and I have adopted: We keep an account of all the eggs we get on Sundays and place their cash values in our missionary box. Sometimes we get but a few cents, again, quite a sum. In this way we are sure our fund will grow a little each week." (I think a plan like that is fine. Hens will work on Sunday, they refuse to be idle. Then why not make them be missionary hens? Who else will have missionary hens besides Bertha? In two weeks I will tell you all about the great Ice Cream Social for our orphan, and who sat at the table, and what we had and did, and didn't do. I have a letter from Drusie also, and by the way, I sent her another $5 yesterday from us, the sixteenth draft from you and me since we began her support.

TEXAS LAND BARGAIN.

I have just purchased 6,400 acres of fine land in Southwest Texas and only need about half of it for my own use. I had to buy the whole tract to get any of it and can hardly afford to cultivate all of it myself. I will sacrifice the surplus, selling in any size tracts at your own terms. It is all fine land, and purchasers may look it over and take their pick—it is all good, so I do not care which part of it I keep. It will pay to investigate this, as I want to sell quick to get cash to cultivate part left to me. Write for full information.

While "Gloria in Excelsis" is the premier among our church music-books we publish and sell many others. We have lower priced books that will be invaluable helps to Bible-schools and protracted meetings. Price list sent on application.

We are filling numerous orders for the picture of Editor Garrison. This is a fine photogravure, 11x12½. This is a work of art all may have for sending us a renewal and one new subscription to The Christian-Evangelist and the necessary $3.00.

In preparing for a protracted meeting, add a few dollars to the expense budget and order a few hundred Christian-Evangelists for distribution each week. We will furnish them at a surprisingly low price and they will prove to be of greatest helpfulness next to Bible study and the preached Word in bringing men to Christ.

We hardly expected such responses to our Summer Bargain Sale advertised on page 1023 as are making our book room a scene of busy industry. The hundreds of dollars worth of orders filled now may injure Fall trade but the book-men say these prices will be maintained through August regardless of consequences. Cut out the adv., check books wanted, return to us and we will ship promptly.

We sell our Bible-school supplies wholly on their merits and not by disparaging the work of others. We send the Dowling series with the statement that they are the best. If on examination you are not convinced they are the best, place your order elsewhere. Nothing else does more to affect a child's future relations with the church than the Bible-school helps. Don't lightly pass by the Dowling series.

The Christian-Evangelist Special over the Wabash leaves St. Louis at noon Oct. 11. Connecting trains will come in from Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, Kansas City, Omaha and Des Moines. The best of train service assured. Party divides at Detroit. Those preferring the water route will proceed by one of the best of lake steamers, the others will go over the Wabash through Canada. Write us soon as you determine positively to go that we may make abundant reservations.

The circulation of The Christian-Evangelist is growing rapidly but with oaken solidity. The clubs we announce as well as individual subscriptions are coming at the regular $1.50 rate. They will continue with us. The majority come in singles. Here are last week's clubs: Mendon, Mo., 3, D. Millar, pastor; Bradalbane, Ont., 3; Allerton, Ia., 5. R. H. Ingram, minister; Irving, Ill., 10, L. Hadway, pastor; Gage, Okla., 17, N. B. McGhee, minister; Litchfield, Ill., 19, W. S. Johnson, pastor; Knoxville, Ill., 19, Albert Schwartz, pastor; Eureka, Ill., 20, A. W. Taylor, pastor; Manchester, N. H., 21, Herbert Yeuell, evangelist; Galesburg, Ill., 24, N. G. A MOTTO

By W. T. Moore

WHAT'S the use of crying?—Fight it!
If for wrong you're sighing—Right it!
Go to work and do not slight it,
Then brighter hope will dawn to-morrow.

Make each day a step up higher,
Every step will bring you nigher
Where at work you will not tire,
And where joy takes place of sorrow.

What's the use of fretting?—Shoot it!
Spend no time regretting—Boot it!
Trouble needs no petting—Loot it!
Life will then be worth the living.

Stand for truth and do not blunder,
That which kills is not the thunder,
Bluster is not normal wonder,
Power comes through quiet giving.

What's the use of pining?—Cheer up!
There's nothing made by whining—Stir up!
The sun will soon be shining—Clear up!
Then do not sickly troubles borrow.

Fight each battle for the better,
Make each day a great red letter,
And trust the right to break each fetter
Binding now the hands of sorrow.

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
  Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
  The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
  For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
  Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
  And the song of victory.

1809 CENTENNIAL PROPAGANDA CHURCHES OF CHRIST 1909

: : : GEO. L. SNIVELY : : :

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

Geo. W. Muckley, known to some of our people as secretary of our Board of Church Extension, and who has been heard in some quarters to admit that church extension is one of the really important interests of the Churches of Christ, will contribute a few articles in this Centennial Propaganda, the first of which is presented below. God grant him the million by 1909!

There is not a week but at least a few more hundred Disciples begin looking toward Pittsburg. One sure index to the number is THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST's new subscription lists. All our readers are looking toward Pittsburg. They are not overlooking intervening conventions, county, district, state and national; they are not ignoring our missionary claims and days nor other opportunities for service and privilege, but they are looking forward to the centennial as the consummation of high hopes. If THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST goes regularly to 100,000 homes a year before 1909, that convention will celebrate achievements far beyond our most sanguine expectations. Below is the testimony of a few friends as to its Christian helpfulness. You are helping a home and a great cause whenever you make it a family fixture.

OUR CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AND CHURCH EXTENSION.

BY G. W. MUCKLEY.

An Announcement.

Great interest is already being manifested in our centennial celebration of this Restoration movement which is to be held at Pittsburg in 1909. This interest is growing daily. Wherever your Secretary of Church Extension goes to address churches the preachers and the people are asking "What does this centennial celebration mean?" We ought to be asking ourselves, "What can we make it mean to the religious world?" Can we deepen our spiritual life and increase the number of those who pray "that they all may be one," to the number of two million during the next four years? Can we become more liberal toward all missionary enterprises; increase our college endowments and benevolences and erect the family altar in thousands of homes? Can we put a Christian paper in every Christian home to fire our hearts and to nourish our enthusiasm for the tasks before us? All of this is possible, and much more. Announcements of the Centennial Committee's plans have already been made and approved by an alert and eager brotherhood. Our religious papers are filling pages with information and a most capable, devoted man, W. R. Warren, of Pittsburg, Pa., has been chosen as our leader, and is the secretary of the committee. It remains now for our brethren everywhere to follow the leadership. In his own congregation every pastor will be the main source of information and inspiration for his people regarding the work to be done preparatory to a fitting celebration.

The Centennial Committee reporting first to our national convention in Omaha in October, 1902, recommended: "That our Church Extension Fund, that splendid feature of home missions, should be increased to $1,000,000 by the time of our one hundredth anniversary at Pittsburg in October, 1909."

Can we reach the million for church extension?

An apportionment has been sent to each congregation in the United States and Canada, the raising of which will insure the million dollars for church extension by October, 1909. The amount asked of each church is not beyond what might reasonably be expected. Many will not raise their apportionments but just as many will go far beyond the amount asked. It is certainly worth while to make the effort since raising the apportionments insures the million.

Letters of confidence and good cheer have been coming almost daily since our books closed last September, saying, "Don't lower the standard. We can raise the million by 1909!" This board asked the Centennial Committee at its recent meeting in Pittsburg: "Is the million dollar standard too high?" The answer came in a chorus, "No! Push for the million. Anything less would be unworthy." Let us reason soberly in the light of church extension's history since 1888:

The first watchword was a quarter of a million by 1900, with which to begin the twentieth century. The mark set was reached by September 30 that year, and more. Then a half million was called for by 1905. On December 30, 1905, the fund amounted to over $540,000. The mark had been passed and over $40,000 besides as an advance toward the million dollars.

The outlook is bright for reaching a million dollar fund by October, 1909. On November 21, 1888, $10,662.80 was turned over, by the home board of Cincinnati, to T. R. Bryan, treasurer of the Board of Church Extension, which had been elected by the national convention in October of the same year at Springfield, Ill. We were twelve years reaching the quarter of a million, which we secured by the close of 1900. In five years we raised the second $250,000. Why should it be thought a thing impossible to add a second half million within the next four years? With over $565,000 in the fund on August 1, 1906, we have only $435,000 to raise, or $110,000 annually. This is reasonable, for our receipts last year were $96,654.82, including the $50,000 Logan gift. We have put our hands to the plow, and can not look back. Forward is the word! It means that the churches now giving must treble their offerings, and those not yet co-operating must fall into line in this work so vital to our home field. Individuals must give large amounts, the annuity fund must grow. With God and a consecrated brotherhood all things are possible. The million dollars for church extension must be reached by 1909!

Centennial Propaganda.

I have been a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST since its beginning and we cannot do without it. I shall do all I can to increase the subscription list in this congregation.—Mrs. S. L. McLeese, Denver, Colo.

Sometimes THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST doesn't suit me, but sometimes I don't suit my wife exactly, but she continues to stand by me in spite of my faults. That is what I have done for THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for years.—W. T. Henson, Slater, Mo.

I am very much in love with THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, its Editor and most of its writers. It is doing more to clear away preconceived ideas on the Bible than any other agency among us. I have only good wishes for its success. —A. N. Woodson.

We have no organization here, and I know of none within forty or fifty miles. I take great comfort in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST which comes to me every week with such good sermons and other help. It is a pleasure to read it, and learn our people are doing so much for the advancement of Christian union and are not afraid to accept the overtures of the divided Christians.—Mrs. C. S. Crane, Russell, Kas.

I have been a subscriber to "The Christian" and to "The Evangelist" and to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. It is my highly esteemed helper. Its arrival is always welcome. For its Editor-in-chief I have great respect and sincere affection. He is rendering the plea of the Disciples an inestimable service. I desire to see THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST introduced into more of our homes, and I hope soon to send some subscriptions.—John C. Hay, Hollywood, Cal.

It has been with growing interest that I have followed your discussion of federation. I desire to express to you my heartiest approval of your course. You would not for one moment assume to be saving this Restoration, but, in my judgment, this is what you are doing. If the spirit manifested by another of our papers is to prevail, then the Restoration movement of the Disciples will prove a monumental failure. These words are written by one who thoroughly believes in the plea of the Disciples of Christ.—A. L. Ward, Christian minister, Roxbury, Mass.

Current Events

Medical Fees.

The physician who sent in a bill of $25,000 against the estate of the late Marshall Field for one week of unsuccessful professional services in the millionaire's last illness, has come in for a good deal of criticism. The old practice was to bleed the patients. The modern way, it seems, is to bleed their estates. There can be no doubt but that this was a greedy doctor. He saw a chance to grab, and he grabbed. In extenuation it may be said that he asked no more than the services were worth to the man who received them. At a time of mortal peril, a man with a hundred millions might be quite willing to pay twenty-five thousand dollars for the attendance of the physician who, in his opinion, would be more likely than any other to save his life. The charge, in other words, was proportioned to the value of the service to the man who received it and not to the cost of the service to the man that rendered it. This is simply "charging what the traffic will bear"—a system which was in vogue long before Mr. C. P. Huntington defined it in this trenchant phrase. In general, the maximum possible price of any commodity is its value to the consumer and the minimum is the cost to the producer. The actual price tends to approximate the maximum, except as competition and the prospect of increasing the volume of business and the total profit by reducing prices tend to draw it toward the minimum. In the case of Mr. Field and his physician, the latter influences were not at work—so up went the price. The competitive principle can never operate freely with reference to professional services, and it is therefore the more needful that the intangible influence known as "the honor of the profession" shall exercise an equivalent restraint. If the ethics of the medical profession condemn a doctor for advertising but permit him to practice extortion, the code needs revision.

Europe and South America.

One of the Paris dailies complains bitterly because the European governments have failed to utilize the opportunity of which Secretary Root is making such splendid use at Rio Janeiro. The Latin countries of Europe have been (characteristically) asleep while the Pan-American congress has been in session. Secretary Root, though only an unofficial visitor, has been by all odds the most influential person at the conference. The warm reception which he has received there has evidently reminded at least one Parisian editor that South America has almost broken the ties which formerly bound it to Europe and is rapidly making new alliances. It will not be many years before the entire western hemisphere will have definitely ceased, as Mr. Root says, to be considered as ground for European colonization.

An Optimist.

For a sunny-hearted optimist, with a genuine Mark Tapley brand of unadulterated cheerfulness, commend us to Mr. John D. Rockefeller. The following words, spoken shortly after his recent return from Europe to a reporter whose persistence had secured an interview, may seem to the scoffer to contain a certain element of platitude, but when one remembers that Mr. Rockefeller's specialty is not literature but oil, one will not be disposed to make much of that trifling defect. He says:

> "I never despair. Sometimes things that are said of me are cruel and they hurt, but I am never a pessimist. I believe in man and in the brotherhood of man, and am confident that everything will come out for the good of all in the end. You can always believe in real men. I bear no ill to any man. I am confident that there is more good than bad in the world, and I am full of the joy of living. I believe in men. Do that and the world is bound to seem a good world to you."

We are gratified to learn that Mr. Rockefeller does not despair. And since he admits a certain sensitiveness regarding the things that are said about him, perhaps the rest of us need not yet despair either. While it hurts, there is hope. A year or two ago there was a general impression that none of the Standard Oil people cared what was said about them. If they really do care, it is worth while to go on saying the true and unpleasant things which need to be said. Our philosophy of life, like Mr. Rockefeller's, includes a firm conviction that "there is more good than bad in the world," and that everything will come out for the good of all in the end." Mr. Rockefeller has occupied a position in which he could, with complacency and entire comfort, await the tardy arrival of this epoch of universal justice. But we wonder if he will recognize it when it comes. Perhaps the Ohio and federal courts which are now after him will help to usher it in. Meanwhile (again like Mr. Rockefeller) we will go on believing in real men, and defining real men as those whom we can believe in.

Niagara.

Mr. H. G. Wells is an English literary man who deals largely in futures. Just now he is contributing to "Harper's Weekly," an excellent series of articles on "The Future of America." His comments on Niagara are exceedingly good. He saw the beauty of the falls, of course, but he saw also the beauty of the tunnels and turbines and dynamos by which a portion of Niagara's energy is made available for human use. They impressed him, he says, far more profoundly than the Cave of the Winds. They "are greater and more beautiful than that accidental eddying of air beside a downpour. They are will made visible, thought translated into easy and commanding things." It is not hard to see the beauty of a great cataract. There has been a chorus of "ohs" and "ahs" going up beside Niagara for generations. But in the course of time there come economic necessities which demand that the beautiful thing be put to practical uses. In their first stages, practical uses are likely to be ugly. But this should never be accepted as ultimate. The practical must be made beautiful, and (equally important) the eye and mind must be taught to find aesthetic values even in utilitarian processes. It was well enough for Congress to place a limit to the amount of water which may be diverted from the falls. But if some sort of federal Bureau of Good Taste could be empowered to pass upon the architectural and other features of the situation, it might easily be possible to utilize many thousands of Niagara's horse-power while really adding to its beauty and impressiveness. A burning warehouse or a burning oil-well is a magnificently beautiful sight. But we do not, therefore, burn our warehouses and oil-wells. We prefer to find less wasteful gratifications for our aesthetic sense. A great unutilized water-power is equally beautiful and equally wasteful. It is estimated that the power developed by Niagara is worth $50 for every visitor who views the falls. Very few of them would be willing to pay that price, but that is what it would cost to hold the falls out of service and use them solely as a spectacle. The modern way to handle the case is to take advantage of the economic values and save as much of the old beauties as possible while creating new ones of a different sort. And perhaps the next step of progress—apparently we have scarcely reached it yet—will be to utilize such great and exceptional natural resources as public assets, instead of turning them over to private hands.

Russian Anarchy.

It is impossible to ascertain in detail just what is going on in Russia, but it cannot be much better than the worst. The censored dispatches allow some little fraction of the truth to find its way through. It appears that the disorders accompanying the mutiny in the Baltic were much more serious and widespread than was at first believed. The mutiny failed, but strikes are threatened, and, in some places are in progress. The mutiny was but a detail of a great popular upheaval, unorganized but fiercely earnest. The army has been almost the sole stay of the present regime. Thoroughly alarmed, almost panic stricken, by the narrow escape from losing this prop, it seems that the government is attempting, by legal or illegal means, to strike terror to the hearts of all malcontents. In many regions not only have the ordinary legal processes been set aside (which was natural and proper enough under the circumstances), but even martial law has been set aside. Suspected insurrectionaries have been shot in large numbers without even the formality of a drum-head court-martial. With the government descending to such measures, it is no longer necessary to fear that a successful revolution may inaugurate a reign of terror. The reign of terror has already been started. It makes little difference whose hands direct it, so far as the preservation of order and justice is concerned. The government is doing as badly as any revolutionary committee would be likely to do.

It is reported that the packing house employes in Omaha are to be clad henceforth in white duck suits, the same to be furnished and laundried by the concerns. This will have a good effect in promoting cleanliness. The man who is clean usually acts clean. It will also have a good effect in settling the public stomach. There was a time not very long ago when European surgeons wore dress suits at their clinics by way of showing that surgery was not equivalent to butchery.

Progress of Peace.

One who is interested in the extension of the kingdom of God on earth should keep his eyes open to those wider movements of the world which make for peace and righteousness. These are no less the result of the influence of Christ's teaching than the additions to our churches under the preaching of the Gospel. It is a fault common among Christians not to look for the evidences of the growth of the kingdom outside of church circles; but we should remember that God is moving upon this world through every avenue of influence open to him, and both by direct and indirect efforts is seeking to bring in the "new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness."

At the present time there is in session in the royal gallery of Westminster Palace at London the Interparliamentary Union, consisting of more than 500 members, representing twenty-three national parliaments. It is composed of some of the ablest and most progressive men of these various parliaments. This is the fourteenth session of this union, the twelfth of which was held in St. Louis during the World's Fair. It is interesting to know that America's representatives are among the leaders in this important movement for the peace of the world. Some of their ideas were objected to at first as too advanced for European nations, but gradually these principles are being endorsed. Some of the important measures taken by this body are: (1) Converting the conference at The Hague into a permanent body with power to assemble periodically and on its own initiative, thus making it a permanent council whose special object is to study the best ways of promoting the peace of nations; (2) widening the scope of this peace council by referring to it certain causes of misunderstanding between nations which had hitherto been excluded; (3) the paying of a salary to the members of The Hague court, and instructing them to begin work at once upon the codification of the law of nations so that there can be a body of international law ready to be applied to international disputes.

Mr. Bryan has just addressed this peace conference in London urging an amendment to the effect that in those questions which are reserved for settlement upon the battle field, force shall not be resorted to until after an investigation by the international court. This amendment, though proposed at a previous session and defeated, was unanimously adopted in London under the strong presentation of Mr. Bryan. It is pleasing to notice that the representatives of the two leading parties in this country are working harmoniously together in this conference in the interest of peace. The prime mover among Americans in this interparliamentary union, was the Hon. Richard Bartholdt, member of Congress from St. Louis, and a Republican, whose action is strongly endorsed by Mr. Bryan. The strong influence which has been brought to bear in behalf of this peace movement by President Roosevelt is well known.

All this looks as if the time were surely coming, and is not so far away, when Tennyson's vision shall be fulfilled:

"When the war-drum throbs no longer and the battle flags are furled
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

The ultimate union of nations for the promotion of the peace of mankind is as inevitable as the ultimate union of Christians for the advancement of the kingdom of God.

Business Side of Christian Union.

Christianity like man has a body as well as a spirit. Some people ignore this fact and preach a sort of disembodied Christianity. True, as in the case of man, the spirit is more important than the body, but, as in the case of man again, the body is quite essential for doing business here in the world.

Christianity embodies itself, first of all, in living, regenerated human beings, who reproduce in some measure the life of Christ. It embodies itself in ordinances which set forth, symbolically, the fundamental facts of the Gospel. It embodies itself, also, in external organization, as in local congregations and other forms of organized and co-operative activities. Furthermore, it tends continually to embody its spirit in laws, customs, institutions, and constitutions; in a word, in Christian civilization.

But in order to these forms of self-expression, Christianity has a business side. This is a fact that is frequently forgotten. The erection of suitable buildings in which local congregations of Christians may carry on the Lord's work is a necessary part of this business side of Christianity. No church in our day and time can accomplish the best results for itself and the community without a suitable meeting-place adapted to the kind of work which it desires to do. Since church buildings are, therefore, a necessity in order to the successful carrying on of Christianity, it is a part of wisdom, or what we sometimes call "sanctified common sense," to do this work in the most businesslike way. The methods of church extension, by which limited sums of money are loaned at a low rate of interest to local congregations, on strictly business principles, to supplement what they can do on the ground, toward the erection of a building, and to be paid back in easy installments, has been found, by long experience, to be the most effective way of assisting young churches in housing themselves and thus in making permanent and practical the results of evangelization. The work as conducted by our own board of church extension has been wonderfully successful and has justified itself in the eyes of business men who have investigated it. It is the privilege of the churches once each year, namely: on the first Lord's day in September, to make an offering to the cause of church extension. As that time is near approaching we call the attention of the churches to this opportunity which is coming to them to assist all their brethren who are without church buildings, in the most businesslike way, to provide themselves houses of worship. This is such an improvement over the old haphazard method of responding to local appeals for churches here and there that it is a wonder that any church among us can be found that is not a willing and regular contributor to this businesslike and systematic method of extending aid to needy churches.

The board of church extension has set for its mark a million dollars by our centennial anniversary in October, 1909. This would be an achievement worthy of celebration within itself. As over $400,000 of this amount yet remains to be raised it will be seen that something over $100,000 a year should be contributed by the churches during the next four years to realize this aim. This can be easily accomplished if all the churches will bear a part and each one do its duty. May we not hope that wherever THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST circulates, which is very largely throughout the brotherhood, the churches will see to it that this offering is regularly and conscientiously taken? Remember that every dollar thus contributed goes into a permanent fund to be used for building churches through all future time.

Close of the Manchester Meeting.

The meeting which was conducted during the month of July in the Park Theater, Manchester, N. H., must be set down as one of the notable meetings of the year. All the conditions surrounding the meeting served to test, most severely, both the tact and ability of the evangelist and the message which he had for the people. The evangelist has succeeded, beyond doubt, in making a deep impression, and a most favorable one, on the best people of Manchester concerning the nature and the plea of the Disciples of Christ for the unity of Christians and a return to simple New Testament Christianity. This impression is reflected by the daily press, as shown by the following extract from the Manchester Union, commenting on the close of the meeting:

> After a month of special meetings at the Park Theater, Dr. Herbert Yeuell closed his engagement Sunday night with an audience of over a thousand, which, considering the hot weather, was a most remarkable crowd to attend an indoor attraction of any sort. The influence of Mr. Yeuell's preaching has been felt throughout the entire city, and large numbers have come in from neighboring towns to hear him.
> The undenominational character of his work has won the sympathy of all classes. Besides being a speaker of unusual eloquence, his personality has stood the severest test that a New England audience could give it. It is many years since an evangelist has held the attention of Manchester audiences so continuously. Some of the most famous evangelists have been brought here, > but they have gone away in some instances before the time expired, without creating a ripple.

> Mr. Yeuell has talked to his audiences as few men would dare to address any people. He has laughed at their foibles as well as praised their virtues, and they have laughed back good-naturedly and seemingly thanked him for his frankness. He is eminently endowed with the saving grace of humor. His evident sincerity and naturalness disarm whatever of criticism might be aroused by his frequent attacks on what he terms "ecclesiastical mossbackism." He says the people he represents, known as the Disciples of Christ, renounce ecclesiasticism and church bossism and creedal entanglements of all kinds and stand apart from all denominationalism and modern fads, demanding of their converts faith in Christ and an observance of the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, as in the days of the apostles.

Following this, the article gives quite a full statement of the basis of unity advocated by Bro. Yeuell, which is familiar to our readers. After this statement the article closes with a description of the closing incidents of the last meeting, as follows:

> At the close of the sermon Mr. Yeuell asked all those who endorsed the sermon to come forward and take his hand. Fully half the audience crowded to the front. Mr. Yeuell then said if they could thus endorse that sermon they should be willing to advocate its teachings, and asked all who would to signify in some way. There was a loud response of amens and a liberal show of hands. He last of all pressed the matter still closer and asked all who would stand by such a movement in Manchester to indicate it in some way. The response was not so prompt. The evangelist then, with a peculiar smile and remarkable tact, said, "Ah, it is one thing to endorse a generality, but will you stand by your convictions? Don't tell me you believe what I preach and come forward to take my hand and cry 'Amen,' and then act unworthy of New England, the home of liberty, political and religious." At this about a hundred hands were raised and several audible responses were made. Mr. Yeuell said it is the intention to disseminate throughout New Hampshire this broad platform of Christian unity based simply on Christ and the New Testament.
> There was great demonstration of feeling while the large audience sang "Blest Be the Tie That Binds." There was general rejoicing when Mr. Yeuell said he would return and carry on the work started so auspiciously.

We submit that this was a rather remarkable demonstration when one considers that it was in a New England audience, among people who had hitherto been in ignorance of our position. Among other evidences of the widespread influence of the meeting is a letter which we have in our possession from a Baptist pastor at Nashua, N. H., who, having read the reports of the meeting in the daily papers of Manchester, writes an urgent letter to Bro. Yeuell to come to that city and conduct a union meeting there. Another letter from a lady of one of the first families of the city asks Bro. Yeuell to have The Christian-Evangelist sent her, and expresses the sincere hope that some time he may return to Manchester, and wishes him success wherever he goes.

It would be a great mistake not to follow up such an auspicious beginning as has been made in that New England city, and our readers will be pleased to know that the intention is to follow it up vigorously with another meeting, the results of the present being conserved, meantime, by frequent visits of Bro. W. C. Crerie, pastor of the Haverhill church, whose congregation has generously permitted this arrangement.

We submitted a financial statement last week showing a considerable shortage in the fund which had been contributed to defray the expenses of this meeting. We trust it is only necessary to state this fact to call forth from our generous readers a sufficient sum to liquidate this indebtedness and to insure the carrying on of the work.

The real significance of this New England meeting is and ought to be that it is the beginning of a more aggressive campaign in the east. Bro. W. J. Wright, the new corresponding secretary, is well acquainted with the conditions in the east, and we are sure will give his hearty sympathy to this movement for giving New England the benefit of a clear presentation of the principles of the Reformation we plead by our most capable evangelists.

Current Religious Thought.

For a century nearly "our plea" has been for Christian unity. We have faithfully preached Christian unity, we rejoice in seeing even our denominational brethren cheerfully practice it. From the last "Western Christian Advocate" we learn of this beautiful fruitage in far Japan:

> The Joint Commission of the Union of Methodism in Japan, composed of representatives of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and the Methodist Church of Canada, met in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., July 18, 1906. After two days of patient and prayerful consideration, articles of union were unanimously adopted and provision made for the organization of the Methodist Church of Japan. This action, authorized by the general conferences of the said churches in the United States and Canada, was in response to the practically unanimous conviction of the pastors and members of the churches in Japan, as well as the foreign missionaries working among them. The name of the United Church will be "Nippon Methodist Kyokwai"—the Methodist Church of Japan."
> The new church will begin its independent existence with a membership of about 11,650, and a native ministry of over 100. The churches in the United States and Canada will continue their active support of the work in Japan as heretofore, co-operating with the "Nippon Methodist Kyokwai."

Our own history abounds in ingenious opposition to the progress of the kingdom, but nowhere does it surpass this from the "Religious Telescope" (United Brethren) opposing the proposed merger of the United Brethren, Congregational and Methodist Protestant bodies. Partly for the comfort it may give our own sorely pressed "left wing" we submit this specimen of reasoning "how not to."

> Is our church a child of providence? If so, then God had a special purpose in not only permitting it to be born, but in directing that birth so as to give it a distinct personality and identity, that it might, in that distinct form, serve the purpose of its birth. Is the United Brethren Church a child of providence? This is what we were taught to believe, and it is what we have taught our children to believe. When we take into consideration the peculiar circumstances connected with the founding of the church, and its subsequent success and prosperity, I think the hand of God is clearly seen. Doctor Berger recognized this fact when he says, on page 19 of our Church History: "The founders of the Church for a long time had little thought of forming an independent church organization, and when once Providence so clearly marked out their course that they could not do otherwise, then they took those steps which must lead to a separate denominational life."
> The above being true, have we a right to say and feel that the United Brethren Church, in her distinctive identity, is not a child of providence?
> If she is a child of providence, then God created her for a noble purpose and mission. Is that mission performed, and has God subserved his purpose with her as a distinct organization? If so, then let her be merged into something else, and let her be no more as an independent organization. I would rather, however, see her die a natural death than have her killed by our own hands. I don't wish to stain my hands with her blood.
> But what are the evidences that her mission is completed and that her work as a distinct organization is done? Has God closed the field to her? Has he ceased to bless her efforts to bring souls to Christ and build up God's kingdom? For over a century God's hand has been leading her into battle and to victory, and through her efforts hundreds of thousands of souls have been won to Christ and saved. At no time in her history has she been more wonderfully blessed than now. At no time has she done a greater work than she is doing to-day. At no time in her history has the field been open to her so wide as it is to-day. At no time has she been so competent to enter and gather the harvest as now. With her colleges and seminary, and with her well-equipped ministry and her well-trained and benevolent laity, she is competent to enter any field and compete with any foe. She is bringing more souls to Christ than ever before. Is not all this conclusive evidence that God's hand is still guiding, that her mission is not finished, and her work not done? In the face of all this, shall we, by forming an organic union with the above-named churches, blot her out of existence as a distinct organization?

Notes and Comments.

Referring to the subject of our recent editorials on our national conventions, Bro. T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, writes: "There are certain tendencies and certain assumptions of some among us that need attention. What we need, I think, is not another convention, but a delegate convention authorized to speak for the churches. In the denominations it is esteemed an honor to be chosen a delegate to their deliberative bodies. No adequate effort has ever been made to secure such a convention among us. I have faith in our people and in our preachers and believe they can be trusted in a convention to discuss any question that concerns the welfare of our cause." President C. C. Rowlison, of Hiram College, writes: "I have read with much interest your article in last week's Christian-Evangelist on "The Function and Value of National Conventions." It seems to me that you have spoken a very true word, and that there is no reason why our national conventions should become merely missionary conventions. To insist that they shall be such, will do more than anything I can conceive of, to destroy the unity and high purpose of our brotherhood. The Disciples of Christ owe their origin to freedom of speech and intelligent discussion of the great questions of religious experience and clear teaching about God and his Word. We will commit suicide if we refuse to stand upon these principles. We ought to emphatically express ourselves as opposed to all such narrowing of the purpose and character of our national conventions." There is no mistaking the sentiment of the leading men among us on this question.

Editor's Easy Chair.

PENTWATER MUSINGS.

A pine-knot fire in an open fire-place on a rainy day is worth more as a promoter of comfort and good cheer than the most costly furniture and richest upholsterings and tapestries. An open fire-place is an open sesame to happiness and peace. No family should be without one. It is Charles Dudley Warner, we believe, that speaks of the absurdity of the family group gathered about the hole in the wall, called a register! What an intrusion civilization has made upon domestic happiness by the invention of stoves, furnaces and steam coils! It is necessary, perhaps, in the city, in the present state of things, but so much the worse for the city. But think of building a summer cottage without an open fire-place! And yet some people do it, and substitute a hole in the flue for a stove pipe! As for us, we decided on the fire-place with its hearth and chimney, the first thing, and then built the remainder of the cottage around that idea! And thus it is that the Easy Chair sits to-day before a fire of glowing and crackling pine chunks, and under the magic spell of the yellow flame and red coals, is unmindful of veiled skies and dripping clouds. How the glowing embers kindle the imagination! It would be interesting to know how many poems, books and great works of art have received their primal impulse from the magic influence of the open fire with its curling flames and its radiant coals. It is associated in memory with childhood, youth and old age, all of which acknowledge its influence and yield to its spell. Blessings on the head of Prometheus, who drew the fire down from heaven, according to the ancient legend, and peace to all its votaries who offer the incense of gratitude on its glowing altars!

Every phase of life has a joy of its own when we once learn how to extract it from the outward shell of circumstances. There is a satisfaction, for instance, in the sense of completeness, as when one's house is finished and furnished, and every room is fitted up with conveniences that adapt it to the use for which it was intended. But there is another kind of joy and satisfaction in the process of bringing order out of chaos, and completeness out of incompleteness. This has been the kind of joy with which we, who make up "The Pioneer" household, have had to content ourselves during the present summer. For a month we have been witnessing the transformation of a pile of lumber into a house, until it has reached that stage in its development in which the carpenters have practically finished their work, and we have taken up the work of the smaller details, which, after all have so much to do with making a house a real dwelling place. "Every house is built by some one," says the author of the Hebrew letter, "but he who built all things is God." Right. Houses do not grow by "resident forces," nor are they the results of accident or chance. Every house, even though it be a summer cottage, that is to be a human dwelling place, must be carefully thought out in its general plan and in all its details, if it is to serve well the purpose for which it is intended. It is a real pleasure, however, to see one's plans taking tangible form, and coming to completion. But the supreme Architect and Builder, as the inspired writer quoted above states, is God himself. What a magnificent structure is this material universe! How even this planet upon which we live showeth his handiwork! And yet this world is only in the making. What must it be when he shall put upon it the last finishing touch? Meanwhile, his is the joy of seeing cosmos come out of chaos, and all his moral creation growing slowly, but steadily, into conformity to his divine plan.

Speaking of the joy that is associated with imperfection and incompleteness, is this not about the only kind of joy that human beings can have in this world? Who of us is not impressed, increasingly with the passing years, with the incompleteness and imperfection of his own life? Who of us ever realizes his ideals here in this life? How slowly our characters develop into the Christlikeness! As we grow older in Christian life and experience, our imperfections seem to be more apparent and our faults more glaring, than they once seemed to us. The best people who have ever lived in the world have been compelled to exclaim, with the Apostle Paul, "I have not yet attained; I am not yet perfect!" It is not this sense of imperfection that gives us any joy, but the belief that, with the help of God, we are gradually growing out of our imperfections, and that one day we shall see him as he is, and be like him. Even our life-work here must remain incomplete. None of us can hope to realize here on earth all our plans and accomplish all our purposes. When the evening time comes and our sun is setting, unfinished work will lie all about us. But we need not repine at this fact. Our Master knoweth best. Perhaps he has some higher and better work for us to do elsewhere. Perhaps those who come after us can carry out, much better than we, our unfinished plans. In any event, we can not doubt that somewhere, under better conditions, we grow into that completeness and perfection which the soul craves and which are denied us here. And so, with Paul, we "press on toward the goal, for the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus," not knowing, as John tells us, "what we shall be," but knowing that when Christ shall be manifested we shall see him and be like him. Surely that is enough!

Our little colony here at Pentwater grows steadily. The Stows from Grand Rapids, the Denholmes from New Orleans, and Mrs. W. T. Moore from Columbia, are among the latest arrivals. Mrs. R. B. Moore, of Indianapolis, is expected to-morrow and W. F. Richardson and wife, of Kansas City, are coming about the 22d instant. Those who come once, they say, get the Pentwater habit and come ever afterward. We have had refreshing rains of late which will bring out later vegetables and small fruits. The peach season is on here now. And this county (Oceana) is the banner fruit county of the state. We have never known the flavor of peaches to be better than it is this year. Even the fish have a good flavor, this year! If our old confirmed anglers who read the Easy Chair, could have seen the brace or pair of black bass we carried home last night it would have made their mouths water! Brother Stow was witness and particeps criminis to the transaction which occurred right in the channel near where the little ferry crosses. With characteristic unselfishness he was doing the rowing, while the Easy Chair sat in the rear of the boat, trolling with an artificial minnow. Suddenly there was a yank on the line, and then a large Tiger bass (small-mouthed) leaped from the water fifty or seventy-five feet in rear of the boat, and the tug began! Brother Stow in his excitement, advised us to abandon the rod and reel and pull him in hand over hand, but of course we took no chances of that kind. When he was safely landed in the boat, the experience was so delightful we turned about and repeated it with the same result. Like true sportsmen having caught enough for one day, we desisted. When Judge Montgomery, of the supreme court of Michigan, saw us carrying those bass home he said he could readily do the same thing but he was afraid it would make him proud! Is there anything quite so cruel as envy?

Looking out over the brotherhood from this our northern perch by the lake side, there seems to be a good deal going on among us in the way of religious activity. Even the summer resorts are becoming centers of religious interest, while great meetings are being reported in different sections of the country. This is as it should be. Rest does not mean laziness, nor idleness. The next offering on the calendar is that for church extension, and we imagine the churches—the real live churches—everywhere are rolling up their sleeves in preparation for a great offering. The indomitable secretary learned through the Easy Chair that a few Disciples were meeting here in an upper room "to break bread," after the manner of primitive Christians, and he has sent us a notice of our apportionment for church extension. Think of a faith like that, not to call it by another name! A homeless, preacherless church give to church extension? We venture the prediction that his faith will be rewarded by the receipt of the sum for which he asks. Because this little band wants to grow into a strong Church of Christ, and it doesn't know of any other way to make such growth, than by joining heartily with the brethren in doing the Lord's work. We are to have an interesting union meeting here next Lord's day, of which we will give report later. Grace, mercy and peace be multiplied to the churches everywhere through the knowledge and service of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be glory and dominion forever and ever! Amen.

As Seen From the Dome

By F. D. Power

From Naples to Nice is not a long journey. We said good-bye to the beautiful bay, and the threatening old monster that dominates all this fair region, at 11 o'clock in the day, and early next morning were in sight of the Maritime Alps. We passed Elba and Corsica on the way—islands so intimately associated with the world's champion butcher. Nice is a city of 90,000, the Queen of the Riviera. In front the blue Mediterranean smiles with myriad dimples to the clear-cut horizon; on every side a vast semicircle of mountains. It is the cosmopolitan winter capital of fashionable seekers after health and pleasure. Garibaldi was born here, and Massena and Gambetta are buried here. It dates from the fifth century B. C. and was Nicaea, "Victory." It shows such a panorama of sea and mountain, such flowers and waves and soft air and sunshine, such orange and lemon groves and olive and fig orchards, such gardens and villas, as one seldom sees on earth. It is not given over wholly to "the fitful and fearsome joys of the Casino." Nature has made it beautiful, and for its rare loveliness of scenery every one is enraptured by it. Mediterranean color, Mediterranean sunshine, Mediterranean romance and poetry, lend it enchantment. A river runs through it, the Paillon, which is nearly dry, and thronged with washerwomen, and miles of garments hung up to dry. It looks as if all the great multitude of the unwashed came to Nice to get washed up for Sunday. It is a paradise for consumptives, and has an endless array of sun worshippers gathered together to this temple of the sun from all the four quarters of the habitable globe. For us, however, it was a raw atmosphere, and while we had the vision of palms and blossoming trees, of rich geraniums and mignonette, and banksia roses falling in cataracts over the walls, of luxuriant festoons of honeysuckle and mimosa draping the trellis-work arcades, and beds of pansies and anemones, and tropical gardens in villa courts, of olive and lemon and orange trees laden with fruit, we had to button our overcoats up to the throat and face a snow shower. Still, Nice is known as the gay and rose-wreathed queen of the smiling Riviera, as the Riviera is known as the garden of Europe, and away from frost and cold, away from the fogs and bronchitis of northern climes come the poor winter exiles to the visions of gray olives shimmering silvery in the breeze on its mountain slopes, and the cataracts of Marechal Niels falling over its gray limestone walls, and aloes and cactuses on its sun-smitten rocks; and its deep blue waters playing under cloudless blue skies. It is the smiling coast from Marseilles to Genoa that is known as "the Riviera." Nice, Monte Carlo and Mentone are the best known resorts. The Maritime Alps cut off the sharp northerly winds, and here at their feet is a sort of Eden of beauty and delight.

It is a wonderful little principality, this of Monaco, at the corner where France and Italy come together, a little independent kingdom in itself, hemmed in between high mountains and the assailing sea. It has its prince and its individuality, and its world-wide fame. Monte Carlo is its center of power, and all the world knows it. We took the upper Corniche road for 15 miles from Nice. No one who has ever passed over that route has forgotten it or will forget it. There is no road in the world like the road from Nice to Monte Carlo, unless it be that from Monte Carlo to Nice. The famous Corniche route runs along a ledge high up on the beetling side of the promontory, and looks down from a height of 1,500 feet upon the sea and its ships riding at anchor. Its windings unfold on either side charming views of the Mediterranean. It is a triumph of engineering built on the mountain side. It affords constant and ever-varying pictures of the quaint ridge of land crowned by the strange capital of the tiny principality which shelters one of the plague spots of the world. As you look down on Monte Carlo from the heights of the Corniche you see without a doubt the most picturesque town site in all Europe, and feel that the devil has chosen for his little hell a veritable Eden of beauty. On every side save seaward great mountains gird it; then the blue, smiling Mediterranean, its rippling waves breaking in soft lace-like foam on the rocks, and beyond streaked with many colors in its many beautiful bays; at your feet the red-tiled houses and white palaces, with their blooming gardens, all lie spread out, like some perfect picture painted in the bright blue of Mediterranean seas, the dazzling gray of Mediterranean sunshine, and the brilliant russet of Mediterranean roofs. So winding about, seemingly so near and yet so far, getting at every turn a finer prospect than before, the marvelous road at last leads you down into the streets of the little city, and then one wonders more and more at the picturesqueness of the buildings, often perched high up on the bold, rocky elevations. It is a surpassingly lovely spot. And the center of Monte Carlo is the Casino. With all the charm of the surroundings, it is to many a man and woman a gaping mouth to the bottomless pit. It is a fair representation of the fabled Isle of the Syrens. Lovely by nature, the grounds of the great gambling hell are made still more lovely by art. From the water's edge terraces of tropical vegetation succeed each other in gradual steps toward the grand facade of the gaming house, clusters of palms and aloes, beds of exotic flowers and beautiful lawns, and trees arranged skilfully to bring bay and mountains to view in most artistic vistas, and then the glare of lights and the dazzle of brilliantly gowned and jewelled women, and glamour of exquisite music and fine paintings and sculpture. Entering the great palace, you pass under the eye of numerous liveried attendants, and, if acceptable, receive your ticket of admission, remove your wraps and pass in and mingle with the great throngs of men and women. One is struck at once by the exceeding seriousness of the groups about the gambling machines. Crowds gather about every table, pressing upon each other in their eagerness to stake their money, and all quiet and terribly in earnest. One can see on their faces how strained and tense, and yet fearfully excited and swayed by fierce passion, many of the gamblers are. Women are as infatuated as men. Some have piles of gold before them and play with the utmost skill and desperate hazard. It is a mistake to suppose they play against each other—they are pitted against the machine. In the principal game there is a wheel of fortune which is turned on a long table by the managers of the bank and a tiny ball goes whirling around a disk marked with numbers. The silver and gold are placed by the gamblers on corresponding numbers on a diagram on the table. When the ball stops on a number corresponding to yours on the table you win, and a certain sum goes into your pocket and all the rest on the table goes to the bank. It is a skin game where the bank has 35 chances to the player's one, and only an idiot would ever risk his money on it; yet thousands are drawn into this awful whirlpool and swallowed up. A million of dollars changing hands daily and a score of suicides every month will tell the story. Many who venture their money and their reputations on the remorseless and certain rock of destruction are professed Christians. It is a terrible spot which the nations should unite in wiping out. Its baneful work affects not only French and Italian young men and women, but Germany, England, America and all the nations suffer from this iniquity. The whole town of Monte Carlo is kept up by this accursed thing. The Prince of Monaco leases the Casino to the company managing it. The church even is called "the Church of Our Lady of the Roulette." The gold and silver which is relentlessly raked in at these tables every hour would seem enough to enrich a kingdom. One looks on in astonishment at this perfect illustration of the wise man's word that "the fool and his money are soon parted," and one wonders at the cool and unblushing legalized robbery going on before his very eyes. It was not without a feeling of relief we turned away from this place of exquisite beauty and gilded yet hellish sin. A drive along the Lower Corniche road, and we found ourselves again on the good ship Arabic, and were soon steaming away toward Liverpool. The journey through the Western Mediterranean, along the coast of France, through the Balearic Islands, and the Spanish waters, brings us again to the Straits of Gibraltar; and then northward, in all a seven days' sea voyage before we reach our starting point for America. This season, we understand, Monte Carlo has broken its record, hundreds of thousands more than last year to the credit of "the bank." Sometimes the public wins. A young Polish count, Jean Sobansky, recently, late in the evening, gathered in $70,000. With its printers and its croupiers and all its gold and glory it is a moral Vesuvius in eruption.

Religious Bosses

By William Durban

For many years I have been impressed with the conviction that the valuable influence involved in gifted personality is habitually so sadly abused that the overshadowing ascendency of great individuals is for the most part an evil. I used to think it a blessing. I have come to consider that it is generally a bane.

The Universal Popery.

After Martin Luther had achieved his emancipation from Romanist superstition he thought for a time that he had absolutely done with popery. So indeed he had, in the ecclesiastical sense. But before long he exclaimed, "Alas! every man is born with a pope in his own stomach." It does not appear to be realized, even by the acutest observers, that the papistical bacteria swarm everywhere, so that on all sides men spring up, in church and in state alike, who pose as miniature autocrats. In my own country, the masters who are most cordially detested by their workmen are those who have risen from the ranks of the employes. For they too often become tyrants of industry, expecting those beneath them to grovel at their feet. The reason is simple. The native pope in the stomach has found scope for his development; that is all!

The Tyranny of the Individual.

My topic has nothing whatever to do with individualism and socialism. I make this proviso lest the mention of "the individual" might raise a suspicion that I am going to drag the kind reader into a very familiar quagmire. I like to avoid bottomless bogs. Those can flounder there who will. I look up with deference and admiration to every individual better and greater than myself. And I revere those who are within the right spirit seeking to work out some brighter social ideal than any yet attained So I am a socialist-individualist, as the New Testament teaches us that Jesus and the apostles were. The Gospel for those who really apprehend its beauty and its truth contains the exact principles of perfect economics. But individualism and socialism alike encounter a crucial difficulty. That obstacle lies in human nature. Godet reminds us that wherever Paul planted any church he invariably found that very soon his work was marred by the perversity or malignity of some obtrusive spirit. All who attempt apostolic enterprise make the same melancholy discovery.

My point, however, is that even great and noble souls have wrought irrepressible harm by their attitude of domination and their autocratic sway. The political world has abounded in records which demonstrate the force of my proposition. As long as Lord Palmerston lived no other statesman had any chance of becoming premier. He was the uncrowned secondary king of England. But he became a puppet in the hands of Napoleon III. and was foolish enough to plunge Europe into the awful Crimean War, under the miserable auspices of that "Napoleon the Little." Mr. Gladstone was the greatest statesman Britain ever knew, and was a shining Christian. But his influence became so overmastering that he unconsciously played the political despot, provoked a rupture in his Cabinet and in Parliament, and flung the nation into political chaos. Still more infatuated did the nation become with the "Cecilian legend" under the power of the late Marquis of Salisbury. Till he in failing health gave up his sceptre, he could and did wield it as a rod of iron. The people are suffering to-day most keenly from the effects of the obscurantist Toryism, which under Salisbury brought back mediaevalism, feudalism and utter contempt for the common people. But strangest of all was the influence of Salisbury's predecessor and master, Lord Beaconsfield, who as Benjamin D'Israeli has been the brilliant rival of Gladstone when both were young. The nation grovelled abjectly at Beaconsfield's feet. He made the good and wise Victoria Empress of India, and his blandishments even infatuated her, so that she seemed to lean decidedly towards the Tory party, in spite of her loyalty to constitutionalism. And thus there are always men who seem by their commanding attributes able to bewitch others and to hypnotize the vast majority of those around them. Such men become the sovereigns of "the sovereign people." Bismarck, Cavour, Ignatieff, Thiers, Parnell, Gambetta, have in their days of domination shown what one man of transcendent capacity could do. With few exceptions, such influence has wrought evil issues in the end.

Despots of Divinity.

How many careers have been blighted and how many hearts have been broken in ministerial circles by those who have been born with the insatiable lust for power, and have found scope for its exercise will never be known. But everybody of protracted experience too well knows that in all the religious bodies sad suffering has resulted from the personal predominance of certain men who have secured great influence, as well as from the abuse of authority by many officials. Some of the saddest of all quiet matyrdoms have been endured at the hands of inquisitors who strange to say, were never weary of proclaiming themselves the elect upraised champions of spiritual freedom from the tyranny of the sects. I happened years ago to make acquaintance with John Nelson Darby, the famous nephew of Lord Nelson, and the founder of the peculiar clique of earnest Christians popularly known as Strict Plymouth Brethren, in contradistinction from the section split off from them under George Muller and Benjamin Wills Newton, known as the Open Plymouth Brethren. Wherever you meet any members of the various

PHYSICIAN SAYS

Children Thrive on Grape-Nuts and Cream.

A Mass. physician has found a cure for constipation in children—citing fifteen cases—by feeding them Grape-Nuts.

"Some time ago," he writes, "I became interested in your food, Grape-Nuts, as a cure for constipation in children. Having tried it in my own family, I have advised it in fifteen cases in which all suffered with constipation more or less severe. The result has been absolute relief in all.

"I write this that other children may be benefited."

How much better it is thus to bring about a healthy action in the bowels of growing children by natural means, than to feed them with improper food, requiring some kind of cathartic at intervals to overcome constipation.

Grape-Nuts gives energy to the entire nervous system including the nerves that cause the natural contraction and relaxation of the bowel muscles, that propel the food mass along.

It is predigested also, and the blood easily absorbs the food as it goes through the body, storing up vitality and force for the functions of all the organs.

Children especially, should get the right start as to habits of living. They should grow into bright, strong cheerful men and women. Grape-Nuts solves the question of the start; a wholesome appetite will do the rest.

Children's teeth are benefited by chewing Grape-Nuts, also. Your dentist will tell you that a certain amount of exercise in chewing firm food, is necessary to grow strong beautiful teeth.

Teeth need exercise just the same as muscles, if they are to grow strong and firm as nature intended. Grape-Nuts gives the exercise and also gives material from which good teeth are made.

bodies of "Brethren," for there are now many splits of the original splits, and splits are being born yet, you will always find that they vehemently denounce sectism, boast of their mission to restore the unity of the Christian church, and deny that they belong to any kind of sect or denomination. But always in each congregation of these good people some boss springs up. In time he finds other bosses competing with him, and there is generally a conflict with clamorous protests about the authority of the Holy Spirit alone. The Brethren began well. There was good cause for their origin. But Darby and Newton spoilt the whole movement. It was bossed to death. And wherever we look there are parallels. I turn to the Anglican Church. The high churchmen have their aristocratic autocrat in Earl Nelson. His personal ascendancy vitiates the plea made by his followers for a revival of spiritual life in the Church of England. And no sooner was the estimable Canon Gore elevated to the Episcopal bench than he forgot all his broad church professions and began to persecute a parish clergyman for alleged heresy. In America the secretary of the Baptist annual congress, Dr. Gessler, has been telling me, in talking of his reminiscences, how a learned and beloved university professor, who was his tutor, was relentlessly persecuted and at length expelled by the authorities, dying soon afterwards broken-hearted.

Whence Proceeds the Autocracy?

My younger readers can, I suppose, hardly appreciate the importance of the topic I have chosen for this article. But older men can. They know that the producing cause of the boss, and of bossism is composite. It proceeds primarily from the individual spirit of Diotrephes, and secondarily from the tendency of sectarians to develop a zeal amounting to fanaticism in the interests of their own opinions. I remember how in my youth many an English Congregationalist minister and deacon was smarting at the memory of the overbearing dealings of Dr. Campbell, who edited for some years a paper called "The Standard," and used his position with remorseless cruelty whenever he felt constrained to differ from preachers of broader views than himself. That poet preacher, T. T. Lynch, suffered many things at the hands of this Congregationalist boss. During the last years of his life the beloved C. H. Spurgeon was betrayed into playing the theological boss. He attempted to straighten out the theology of the whole of the Baptist denomination, broke up his great annual conference and remodeled it on narrow evangelical lines, with a Calvinistic creed which all must sign, and only suffered acutely himself from the rebellion of a large contingent of his young followers, some of whom were amongst the ablest preachers who had gone forth from his college. The noblest leaders commit errors of procedure. I have just received a letter from the most brilliant young Wesleyan minister I know in England. He draws very large congregations. But he is being bitterly pursued by certain case-hardened old leaders in his own circuit and some circuits adjoining. He has preached fearlessly along lines of thought not always strictly according to Methodist tradition. He has been made to smart for his individuality. He complains that, excellent though Methodism is in many features of its organization, its theology is of a cast-iron type. He was recently cordially invited to a very fine new district, but certain powers behind the scenes intervened and nullified the overtures. Enough! I might proceed, but this time desist.

What the Brethren Are Saying and Doing

By B. B. Tyler

Herbert Yeuell's reports of his work at Manchester, N. H., have awakened my interest and excited my enthusiasm from the beginning. The climacteric report is that in THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of August 2. It is certainly a great thing to have an audience of 1,000 interested people the last Lord's day evening in the month of July. To call together such a congregation at such a time, to have almost one-third of those present formally endorse the preaching and express sympathy with the new movement, while 100 express a readiness to become members of the to-be-organized church, is a most extraordinary achievement, especially under the circumstances existing in the city of Manchester. How many ministers of the Word in the United States, suppose you, preached to a thousand men and women Sunday evening, July 29? It will be interesting to see their names in print. I thank God for young men who can assemble such audiences and excite their interest in the things of the kingdom.

But the writer of "Our Budget," in what he says about this effort to organize a church in Manchester, did not, it seems to me, express himself clearly, or say exactly what he meant, when he spoke of the potential congregation as a church "patterned in every particular after the Jerusalem model."

It is to be hoped that the church which will be organized in Manchester will be a better congregation than was the church in Jerusalem. In some respects the congregation in Jerusalem was a model—in other respects it was not. It had the right creed and the right ordinances. The foundation of the church was exactly right. It rested on the Christ as the chief corner stone. The people of which the church was composed faced in the right direction. This is the best that one can say for the church in Jerusalem. It is true that it was an example of liberality in caring for its own poor. Put that to the credit of the Jerusalem congregation; but, its charity was not dignified and orderly. The members meant well, but, in a short time were in a snarl because some were, as they thought, neglected in the distribution of alms. "Lessons from the Jerusalem church" would be a good subject for a sermon. Try it!

This church was not a missionary congregation. It made no attempt, so far as the record furnishes information, to obey the command of the Christ to herald the good news to the whole creation. It is more than probable that an uncircumcised Gentile believer would not have been cordially received into its fellowship nor have been given a welcome to the Lord's table. The Jerusalem congregation was an anti-missionary, close communion, Hebrew Christian church The most conspicuous member of this church did not, for a long time, understand that in every nation he who fears God and works righteousness is acceptable to him; and it required a miracle three times repeated, before he was able to grasp this fundamental principle of Christianity, and this was years after the beginning of the church. This good man scorned to associate with men of Gentile birth and breeding. The Jerusalem church was pretty narrow. Don't you think so? It is not referred to by any writer in the New Testament as a "model." Paul spoke of the congregation in Thessalonica as an "example"—but not the church in Jerusalem. Paul did not stand well in that church. But for the influence of Barnabas he would not have been recognized by it as a Disciple of Christ. See how, years after his conversion, the members of the Jerusalem church felt toward him, and how they treated him, on account of the catholicity of his spirit. Do not fail as you study this "model" (?) church to note the kind of teachers who went out from it, the doctrine they taught, and the serious trouble of which they were the occasion. Collect all that is said in the New Testament about the Jerusalem congregation and you will join with me, I am sure, in the wish that the church to be organized in Manchester, N. H., may be more like the head of the body, even our Lord Jesus Christ, than was "the Jerusalem model."

When my mail came in this morning I found in a paper DEVOTED TO THE RESTORATION OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY, ITS DOCTRINES, ITS ORDINANCES AND ITS FRUITS, a picture of a meeting-house around which was a multitude of people, and under which were the following words:

"An independent Church of Christ near Minden, Neb. These are mostly Danes. This church is only partially organized, but as far as I know, these are all IMMERSED BELIEVERS WHO PRACTICE NOTHING ELSE."

This is good. "Immersed believers who practice nothing else."

Such believers are numerous in Colorado. There is an indefinite number of "immersed believers" in the middle west, and even in the district east, "who practice nothing else."

Immersed men and women, who believe in Jesus Christ our Lord, ought to practice, habitually, many other things. To stop with immersion is to make a fatal mistake. Immersed believers ought to practice self control, patience, godliness and brotherly kindness. They ought to practice prayer and the forgiveness of injuries. They ought to take the Lord into partnership in the making and in the spending of money. Out of every dollar that the immersed believer earns, or makes, he ought to lay by at least 10 cents to be used in helping all men, especially those who are members of the household of the faith, and in the promotion of righteousness among men. There are altogether too many immersed believers in our churches "who practice nothing else."

But this, of course, is not what the brother meant. He did not mean that the baptized Danes, of whom he wrote, do not practice the virtues named. He meant to say that when they baptized folks they immerse them in water, they do not sprinkle water on believers and call it baptism. They do not pour water on men and women who believe in the Christ and call it baptism. When persons believe in their hearts that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, when they repent of their sins, and openly confess Christ, they are immersed in water, into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. And this these Danes call baptism. In this they are indisputably right. Their position is invulnerable. No one calls it in question; the man does not live who will say that penitent believers immersed in water, with the accompanying formula, have not been baptized.

And this baptism is, on the part of the baptized, a solemn agreement entered into with the Head of the Body that they will endeavor to be and to do, at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances, whatever the Lord Jesus desires them to be and to do. This is what baptism means. There is no step more solemn; none more important.

Modern Religious Persecution---A Defense

By B. L. Chase

5. Instructions to Persecutors.

In carrying on your arduous, delicate and ill-reputed business, among an independent and free people like the Disciples, perhaps the experience of one who has been a long and careful observer of persecuting methods and their effects will be helpful to you.

First of all, I would say, read the Scriptures, especially the Old Testament. You will need mental and spiritual preparation to brace you for your work; you must remember that the heretic and his friends do not see the malignity of his crime as you do. They are at first, likely to resent your interference with his work, and will inquire who appointed you a judge over him. They think you are a man of like passions with themselves—as likely to be mistaken, to be biased, and to be mercenary, as themselves. But they do not realize the purity and unselfishness of your motives, the infallibility of your discernment, the universality of your learning.

I would especially recommend for your reading, parts of the books of Joshua and the Judges, Judges 4:21, would be especially strengthening just before you are about to open a professor's head and show his college trustees and supporters its diseased contents. The passage reads: "Then Joel, Heber's wife took a tent-pin, and took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the pin into his temples, and it pierced through into the ground; for he was in a deep sleep." Be sure to catch the professor when he is asleep, as most of them are when they need your services. Be careful, however, to show to the brethren who contribute money to the college, only the diseased parts of his brain. If you should find, on opening, that it was only slightly diseased, have near by you the diseased brains of famous infidels, and stealthily substitute them for the sound parts of the professor's brain, so that his brain will appear completely diseased. It will be immaterial what infidel's brains you have ready, whether Celsus, Voltaire, Paine or Ingersoll. Make sure that they look bad and emit a very disagreeable odor. What you want is a clear case at any cost.

Of course I am speaking figuratively, you know what I mean. It would certainly be embarrassing to attach the name "infidel" to a man and then let him get away and disprove it to the people. A few such mistakes have happened in our recent history. It is rather hurtful to your business. Better wait until you have a decisive case worked up against him. Two or three more failures may discredit your sanctity and infallibility. Above all things you must carry the people with you, for they support both the persecutors and professors. It would be disastrous to turn away the support from yourself to the accused. But in such a case the very best thing to do is to acknowledge your mistake, for what you lose of infallibility in the one case, you get back in the repute for fairness in the latter case. Then you can remind the people that you were imposed upon by the witnesses, and they will take out their contempt on the rascally witnesses. The people easily forget such things any way, especially if you keep right on preaching their convictions. A cause so holy as the exposure of heresy is sure to find support.

Another group of Old Testament passages which it would be helpful to read, would be the "imprecatory Psalms." Let me caution you against reading the New Testament while you have a man on trial. Don't read the Sermon on the Mount, or the 13th chapter of I. Corinthians, for experience has shown that they are very debilitating to the persecutor. Men will rise up in defense of the heretic and will talk senseless things about love, brotherliness and freedom. Don't listen to their siren voices. Liberty has always been the plea of the accused heretic. He desires to be free to poison the streams of life, and to deny you the freedom to prevent it. Luther desired to be free to change the constitution of the church to suit his fancy. His strike for liberty filled all Europe with war. How gloriously our New England fathers beat back the encroachments of liberty. They understood what a foul thing it was. One wrote:

"Let men of God in courts and churches watch,
O'er such as do a toleration hatch,
Lest that ill egg bring forth a cocatrice,
To poison all with heresy and vice."

They banished the so-called "apostle of religious liberty," Roger Williams; hung the Quakers who died with a plea for liberty upon their lips, and strangled all dissent. They are said to have cultivated familiarity with Old Testament history.

If objections to your persecutions remind you of the claims of love and brotherhood, remind them of what God's faithful servants of olden time did with the enemies of Jehovah, how Joshua put the people of Jericho to death, "both man and woman, both young and old;" how

AN OLD TIMER

Has Had Experiences.

A woman who has used Postum Food Coffee since it came upon the market 8 years ago knows from experience the necessity of using Postum in place of coffee if one values health and a steady brain.

She says: "At the time Postum was first put on the market I was suffering from nervous dyspepsia and my physician had repeatedly told me not to use tea or coffee. Finally I decided to take his advice and try Postum, and got a sample and had it carefully prepared, finding it delicious to the taste. So I continued its use and very soon its beneficial effects convinced me of its value for I got well of my nervousness and dyspepsia.

"My husband had been drinking coffee all his life until it had affected his nerves terribly. I persuaded him to shift to Postum and it was easy to get him to make the change for the Postum is so delicious. It certainly worked wonders for him.

"We soon learned that Postum does not exhilarate or depress and does not stimulate, but steadily and honestly strengthens the nerves and the stomach. To make a long story short our entire family have now used Postum for eight years with completely satisfying results as shown in our fine condition of health and we have noticed a rather unexpected improvement in brain and nerve power." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Increased brain and nerve power always follow the use of Postum in place of coffee, sometimes in a very marked manner.

Look in pkgs. for "The Road to Wellville."

the people of Israel under the direction of the prophets slaughtered the Canaanites, the Amalekites and the Philistines; how Elijah commanded the prophets of Baal, more than four hundred in number, to be slain; then ask the objectors how they could possibly object to so mild and kind a treatment of a heretic among the Disciples as to cut off his living and his usefulness. You do not forbid him to live, but simply to get a living by preaching or teaching among the Disciples.

Under the specious pretense of charity or liberty a brood of errors might creep into the teaching of our colleges and churches. The people of the churches and the students of the colleges need protection. They are ignorant of the fine points of heresy and infidelity. Students and people alike are as helpless in the hands of preachers and teachers as David would have been if he had met Goliath without a sling. We need preachers to watch the people; we need persecutors to watch the preachers and professors; but the persecutors give account directly to God. There is nobody above them but God.

In case you single out for exposure a professor with a large family of little children to care for, I would recommend that you prepare yourself by reading, in addition to the "Wars of Israel," the story of "French and Indian Wars." It will have a tendency to allay all foolish compunctions of conscience. I have said nothing of the histories of the "Inquisition of the Middle Ages," by Lea, or of his later work, the first volume of which has just come out on "The Spanish Inquisition." I took for granted your familiarity with them, and with the story of your illustrious predecessors in office, Torquemada and the Duke of Alva.

Our Great Agreements

An Illustration From the Himalaya Mountains

By G. L. WHARTON

It was on the Himalaya mountains over 7,000 feet above sea level. A Christian Endeavor Society had been organized composed of the missionaries and their families and friends who were thrown together for a time. It was composed of different kinds of Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Disciples and several Church of England young people. At one of our meetings it was proposed that we try to get the Church of England chaplain to join us. Some thought it would be useless, for he was known to be a high ritualist. The society, however, appointed your correspondent to visit the reverend gentleman and invite him to join us.

I called at his residence one morning before breakfast and sent in my card. He received me coolly but with courtesy. I at once made known my purpose, saying that I had come to see if he would not join our society. He remarked that it could hardly be for, he said, "I am a high churchman, you know."

"Yes," I replied, "and I am no churchman at all; yet I believe that we agree in many more things than we differ."

"I hardly know," he replied doubtfully.

I had made some preparation for this part of our conversation, so I said, "Let us see in how many things we do agree," taking out a paper from my pocket. I suggested that we write down our agreements first and then our disagreements and then compare them. With this he seemed pleased and interested. I began:

1. "We agree that there is one God and that he is our Heavenly Father."

"Oh, certainly," he replied.

2. "We agree that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God and our Savior."

"Most surely," he said.

3. "We agree that the Holy Spirit is given to all God's people as a guide and comfort in all times of trouble."

"Yes, I do," he said.

4. "We agree that the Bible is the Word of God, and is the only sure and perfect rule of faith and practice."

To this he gave most hearty assent.

5. "We agree that salvation is through the atoning sacrifice and grace of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and not from any merit in human works."

"Most certainly," he replied.

6. "We agree that it is the duty of all Christians to live a holy, righteous and godly life after the pattern of our Master, Christ."

"Yes," he said.

7. "We agree that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation and that it must be preached in all the world according to the Great Commission."

To this he replied with a hearty affirmative.

8. "We agree that it is the desire and prayer of Jesus our Lord that all who believe on him should be one that the world may believe."

"Yes."

9. "We agree that Christ will come again in glory to judge the world in righteousness."

"Certainly," he affirmed.

10. "We agree that there will be a resurrection of the dead—both the just and the unjust—at his appearing, and that he will give a crown of life to all who love his appearing."

To this he gave assent as usual.

The Field of Sport

By Andrew Scott

A time for everything. A time to make merry and a time for prayer. A time to work and a time for play. It is not our purpose to argue the necessity or the helpfulness of legitimate sport. Recreation follows creation and many so-called sports are regarded by people in a position to know, as the best means, under proper conditions, of recreation known to them. We concede then the right of men to fish, boat, run, jump, play ball, hunt, etc. We are now concerned simply with the time of these things. I admit that the kind and character of sport; its place and environment are questions worthy of our attention. The time of it is the question of the hour. I am aware of the fact that this question touches other questions which might properly be considered with it. The abnormal interest taken in sport by many at this time is having much to do in fixing the time of it, but we must, for fear of diverting attention from the main issue, refrain from going into these things now.

Our fathers had a Lord's day of quiet, worship and rest. Our Lord's day is desecrated. We are greatly disturbed on every hand. Excursions, picnics, ball games and resorts galore interfere with the quiet and rest of the day most sacred of all. The shriek of the locomotive and the cheer from the ball game disturb the worshop of the sanctuary. This is not all. The day set apart to the memory of the departed loved ones, May 30, has already become the greatest of all the days of the year for games and sport of all kinds. The day set apart for thanksgiving and family reunions is perverted in the same way. The time would fail me to tell of labor day, Washington and Lincoln's birthdays, etc., when the spirit of sport takes possesion and holds high carnival regardless of the importance or sacredness of the day. If things keep on in this way we shall soon be unable to have a funeral without a picnic-basket, a ball-bat or a fire cracker bobbing up to claim the right of way. I protest against this usurpation. While conceding the legitimacy of healthful, helpful sport we object to its encroachment on sacred days and hours set apart for purposes high as heaven and holy as our God. Let a day be set apart for recreation when proper and helpful sports may be indulged in to the pleasure and satisfaction of all. Such day may be annual or monthly, or even weekly, if thought best. Many who indulge in recreation on the Lord's day violate their conscience in so doing. The temptation is set before them and their love of sport causes them to yield. Their conscience is violated. It becomes seared as with a hot iron and ceases to trouble them. This is dangerous. Recreation thus becomes dissipation and not only religion but good morals are damaged and wrecked. The nation is in danger. History is repeating itself. Remember Rome. Our civilization and government are founded on Christianity. Let us not desecrate its institutions and laws. Let ministers and editors cry aloud and spare not and let all good citizens aid in rescuing our sacred days from desecration and thus help save our people and nation.

Our Budget

—"One thing thou lackest!"

—Let us frankly concede its universal application.

—We sweetly admit lack of perfection in our friends and our wives' relatives.

—But how about me?—aye there's the rub.—

> "O wad some power the giftie gie us
> To see oursilves as ithers see us."

—There is no virtue in merely confessing shortcomings and in meek resignation to lack of even one thing needful to make men or congregations better and more useful.

—Schedule, inventory, take stock, probe, hammer, drop the plummett, use the microscope and mirror, learn your lack. It is generally discovered when on one's knees, or standing in the white light raying forth from the immediate presence of the immaculate Son of God.

—If the lack is courage, go with Moses to Egypt's throneroom; if optimism, read The Christian-Evangelist; if faith, walk with Abraham; if brotherly love, scan one of our contemporaries and experience "similia similibus curantur"; if patience, remember heaven's long sufferance of you; if it is a sense of direction, stand with Isaiah on mountains of hope as divine purposes unfurl; if zeal, go forth one day with the apostles preaching the everlasting Gospel. In some way quickly complete your equipment and work for the night cometh.

—Let every pledge for foreign missions be redeemed before September 30. Please send your offerings at once.

—H. J. Reynolds, Camp Point, Ill., wishes the services of a good gospel singer for a meeting with his home church beginning November 18.

—Ernest H. Wylie is in a good meeting at Enterprise, Texas. Brother Wylie is an able Gospel preacher and will doubtless greatly edify that enterprising church.

—Our general superintendent will preach next Lord's day morning at the Mexico (Mo.) Chautauqua. He hopes while there to meet many of the central Missouri preachers and other disciples.

—The handsome new $6,000 church building at Jellico, Tenn., will be dedicated early in October. Tennessee is making many handsome contributions of late to our church architecture.

—The foreign society is sending forth a splendid body of new missionaries to foreign lands next month. This step will involve an increased outlay. The friends of the work must bear this in mind.

—We regret to learn of the dangerous illness of the wife of our Missouri state corresponding secretary. The prayers of all her friends are solicited, to the end that Sister Abbott's health may be completely restored to her.

—In the two weeks' meeting recently closed at Lebanon, Texas, J. P. Adcock added 13 to the membership of the church. Of these six were by confession and baptism, three from Baptists and one from Methodists.

—R. B. Havener, of Windsor, Mo., dedicated the Alder Springs, Mo., church the 5th instant. All indebtedness was fully paid, and better than that, during the services five dedicated their lives to the Master's service.

—Robert B. Chapman, of the Butler, Ind., church, informs us the Disciples of DeKalb county will hold their yearly meeting with his church August 25 and 26. Wallace Tharp, of Allegheny City, has been secured as chief lecturer.

—J. F. Sloan is supplying C. A. Finch's pulpit at Topeka, Kan., during the latter's vacation. The middle of September Brother Sloan will take his departure for Los Angeles, Cal. He will greatly help any church in which he ministers.

—Wren J. Grinstead, of Jellico, Tenn., knows of five excellent fields of usefulness, with salaries ranging from $800 to $1,000, to which he would like to recommend suitable ministers, if applicants will send him good recommendations as to fitness.

—We are pleased to again welcome to our desk the "Pacific Christian," that has emerged from its baptism of fire bright, newsy, consecrated to the extension of primitive Christianity and most helpful. We bespeak for it the generous patronage of all Disciples on the coast.

—Wren J. Grinstead has resigned the pastorate of the Jellico, Tenn., church to accept the chair of languages in the Eastern Kentucky State Normal at Richmond. Such leisure as he may have from school duties will be devoted to the study of religious pedagogy.

—L. D. Hill has resigned as evangelist for the Seventh Illinois Missionary District and located with the church at Benton, Ill. Brother Hill is one of our best young preachers, and we are sure he and his wife will prove great helpers to the Benton church and community.

—W. H. Scott is in a meeting at Russellville, Mo. It is a very difficult field, but there have been four additions to the membership. He wishes the address of E. E. Davidson. Any one knowing the whereabouts of this brother write Brother Scott at Eldon, Mo., R. F. D. No. 1.

—Remember the books of the foreign society close for the current missionary year September 30. All offerings should be sent to F. M. Rains, secretary, box 884, Cincinnati, O., before that date. The time is now short and immediate attention should be given this important matter.

—O. D. Maple, of Marion, O., has united with him J. Ross Miller in an evangelistic team. Their first meeting will be at Gas City, Ind., beginning September 10. Brother Maple is a workman of whom none needs to be ashamed. We predict a most successful evangelistic career.

—Andrew Scott's "Field of Sport," in another column, is worth serious consideration by all Disciples. Desecration of the Lord's day is bound to end in a very serious lowering of the moral tone of any community, if indeed it does not impair the foundations of all government.

—Wallace M. Stuckey is now engaged in his Galesburg, Kan., meeting. Rains and mud have interfered with attendance, but have not dampened the ardor of this enthusiastic evangelist. He is assisted by 300 Christian-Evangelists each week. We hope for splendid results.

—B. L. Wray reports 54 additions at regular services during his eleven months' pastorate at the Budd Park Church, Kansas City, Mo. The church is planning for a great evangelistic campaign during September. We rejoice in Brother Wray's success in our sister city at the mouth of the Kaw.

—Heartiest congratulations, A. E. Dubber, over the action of the Tabernacle church in Fort Worth, Tex., in unanimously increasing your salary $500 per annum. But preachers who, like you, seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness usually have an abundance of worldly things added unto them.

—Daniel George Cole, 5031 Page avenue, St. Louis, received a young woman, who is both deaf and dumb, into the membership of the Festus, Mo., church, August 5. Through an interpreter the convert, in sign language, expressed great joy in having found her Savior and the helpfulness of brothers and sisters in Christ.

—R. H. Lampkin writes that the sermon of George L. Snively, of this paper, "delivered before the Dexter, Mo., Chautauqua August 5 was a masterful presentation of the fundamentals of Christian faith, and many were the words of favorable comment heard on every hand. Our cause received a great uplift by reason of his visit here."

—Evangelist S. J. Vance is meeting with gratifying success at Reger, Mo. Eighteen have signified their intention of uniting with the Church of Christ. This new church will be founded at once and regular preaching services provided for before the meeting concludes. Brother Vance soon begins another meeting at Sorrell, Mo.

—The fifteenth annual state convention of the Christian churches of Oklahoma will be held in El Reno September 3-6. This will be the last territorial convention. A most excellent program has been prepared and a large attendance is confidently expected and greatly desired. O. L. Smith and his local congregation will be most delightful hosts.

—"The Daily Herald," of Columbia, Mo., announces that Prof. Chas. M. Sharpe will deliver a series of popular Bible lectures through the Columbia Mo., Chautauqua Assembly. Among the topics we note, "Prehistoric Origins," "Moses the Creator of Israel;" "Samuel the Israelitish Warwick;" "The Wonderful Book;" "The Everlasting Jew."

—J. R. Crank concludes his Paragould, Ark., pastorate September 16. He writes: "This is a good field for an energetic man of God, but it will be a disappointment to any one who loves a nice place and a good salary more than the work of the Master." Any church is to be congratulated that secures the services of Brother and Sister Crank.

—Brother Garrison seems to think he is resting in his lake shore home among the Pentwater pines, but most of us would think we were working if we, like him, were preaching every Lord's day, writing several pages for The Christian Evangelist, attending to an immense personal and editorial correspondence and preparing a book on "The History of Christian Unity" for publication.

—The "Dallas News" reports the death of George E. Walk, son of David Walk. In the beginning of his ministry he was a member of the Christian Church, but later in life united with the Episcopalians, and at the time of his death was dean of St. Matthew's Cathedral, the largest Episcopal parish in Texas. Our sympathy goes out to his venerable father and all his relatives and friends.

—Senator B. F. Wirt, of Youngstown, who is a candidate for the Republican nomination for the office of secretary of state of Ohio, is a zealous member of the Third Christian Church of that city. He is of the third generation of his family to be actively identified with this Restoration movement in the Western Reserve. Naturally, the members of our churches in Ohio are very desirous the convention will honor itself by making him the nominee.

—A minister is needed for half time at Newtonia, Mo. Inquirers may address C. C. Graves, of Newtonia, or E. J. Church, Seneca, Mo.

—C. L. McKim has resigned at Dallas City, Ill., to accept the pastorate of the Oelwein (Ia.) church. Iowa thus adds another to the long list of able preachers she has recently taken from Illinois.

—Alice Long, of Cravity, Ia., writes that the church there wishes a minister. Salary $700 to $800. We hope regular services will soon be resumed in that congregation.

—All desiring the minutes of the South Kentucky Christian Missionary and Sunday-school Association may receive one by applying to W. J. Hudspeth, Hopkinsville, Ky.

—His hosts of friends will rejoice to know that Assistant Editor Moore is rapidly regaining health and strength among the heights, thermal springs and other wonders of the Yellowstone.

—C. W. Comstock, of King City, Mo., assisted by G. A. Butler, leader of song is in a meeting at Orrick, Mo. We hope soon to hear that the Orrick church has greatly increased in membership and been edified in the faith.

—T. D. Secrest reports a meeting just closed at Marfa, Texas, conducted by B. B. Sanders, assisted by Mrs. Edith Steinbrook. There were six additions at Marfa and four at Valentine as the visible results of the meeting.

—S. B. Moore, of the Hammett Place Church, St. Louis, is visiting in his boyhood home at Madison, Ind. Very few veterans of the civil war are blessed like Brother Moore with the presence of their parents in the old home.

—R. E. Rosenstein's first meeting as Living Link evangelist continued ten days at Banner school house, near Chickasha, I. T. There were thirty-three additions, nineteen being by confession and baptism. He is now in a meeting at China Springs, Texas.

—Correspondents of F. G. Fisher will please take note that he is no longer at Adel, Ia., but at 43 Leicester Court, Detroit, Mich. He is being greatly blessed in his ministry at the Woodward Avenue Church. There have been eight additions since last report.

—Evangelist S. M. Martin is in a meeting at Sturgis, Ky., with twenty additions to date. Within the past few months more than 350 have been added to the Kentucky churches during his meetings. Brother Martin is assisted by several members of his family.

—George L. Bush, whose ministry at McKinney, Texas, has been one of the most successful of all those that are making us so strong in the Lone Star State, has accepted a call to the Gainesville (Tex.) church. May his characteristic successes and manifest blessings from on high continue with him.

—Robert H. Newton's church at Normal, Ill., will hold special revival meetings through October. To help insure success S. E. Fisher, of Champaign, and H. A. Easton, of Chicago, have been engaged to assist. More than eighty of the homes represented in the membership now take a church paper.

—R. B. Havener, of Windsor, Mo., has closed an eighteen days' meeting with the Adler Springs church, Atwell, Mo. There were thirty-eight additions, thirty being by primary obedience. The church now has 117 members, a new church home, is free of indebtedness and will hereafter have preaching half time.

—M. G. Mershon reports a meeting held by E. S. Baker, of Jackson, Tenn., with the Milan, Tenn., church. There were thirteen additions, ten being by confession and baptism. The official board of the Milan church wishes to correspond with a minister with a view of calling him to the Milan pastorate.

—M. J. Nicoson is proving a most worthy successor of J. W. Kilbourne, at Keokuk, Ia. He has returned from his vacation in Indiana, and will enter upon the fall and winter campaign with renewed strength and enthusiasm. He ministers to one of the most delectable congregations in our brotherhood.

—R. O. Rogers, of Fredericktown, Mo,. sends us a booklet by T. P. Matthews—"Which? Are you a Christian or a Campbellite?" The young Endeavorer author makes the privilege of bearing the name of Christ seem very precious, and his writings should be widely distributed among our people and others.

—From the "Christian Observer" (Presbyterian), of Louisville, Ky., we learn that J. P. Lichtenberger, of New York, assisted by Miss Wambaugh, of Indiana, is holding a very successful revival at Tazewell, Va. It is an indication of better things to be to have this denominational paper speak so kindly of this meeting.

—F. M. Rains is returning to Cincinnati after an exceedingly successful tour through the west. He developed four Living Links in the foreign missionary society, dedicated the church at Ocean Park, Cal., and addressed four state conventions. This zealous secretary may be fully relied on to do his full part toward making our Pittsburg Centennial splendid.

—The ninth and last territorial convention of the Disciples of the Indian Territory will be held in McAlester August 28-30. The C. W. B. M. will hold its annual convention at the same place August 27-28. An exceedingly interesting program has been arranged and a large attendance is expected. Those expecting to attend should address T. R. Dean, South McAlester, I. T.

—Corresponding Secretary John H. Brooks sends an appeal for more good preachers for Northeast Arkansas. He has recently closed a meeting of five days at Blythedale with three confessions. The people are hungering and thirsting for the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Are there not ministerial volunteers for this rapidly growing section of our country?

—F. H. Groom, Whitehall, Mont., reports great encouragement in his revival services. There have perhaps been more evangelistic meetings held in Montana this summer in proportion to the number of our congregations than in any other part of the land. Soon we shall hear no more of the "godless northwest." Heartiest good wishes, Brother Groom, and to all your co-laborers in that mountain empire.

—Your next week's Christian-Evangelist will contain a pink subscription blank. The intention of this is not to remind you of any subscription delinquencies, but to solicit your co-operation in doubling the circulation of The Christian-Evangelist. If you find it impossible to return this blank with the name of a friend who is not now reading The Christian-Evangelist, you may use it for your own renewal.

—Evangelist C. O. McFarland held a very successful meeting at Green Ridge, Mo., the last three weeks in July. Though there was much opposition to the meeting manifested by certain sectarians, seven united with the church by confession and baptism, three came from the Baptists and three from the Congregationalists. Bro. J. Jones reports the church greatly edified by the meeting.

"Help us to get into our own church home."

ARE YOU READY

to enlist your congregation for Church Extension in SEPTEMBER?

The Board at Kansas City ceased promising loans in March and have asked for aid in building since then, and $125,000 is needed for these appeals. Inspiration enough, you say, to enlist any Church of Christ in the Annual Offering.

93 WORTHY MISSIONS

WRITE AT ONCE,

ordering literature and collection envelopes, and tell the Board you will take the offering.

The Annuity feature of Church Extension is profitable to you and the Board. You receive 6 per cent and the Board builds churches with your money. Write for information to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo.

—R. H. Lampkin, minister of the Dexter, Mo., church, recently visited the Piggott, Ark., congregation and preached on tithing. Four wage earners promised to tithe their incomes and pay it to the church. This in itself means $30 additional to be paid into the treasury each month. Brother Lampkin is especially qualified for this tithing ministry, and ought to be kept busy in it by our churches.

Free U. S. Gov't Lands

In that region are millions of unoccupied acres. Much of this land can be irrigated, or crops grown under the Campbell system of "dry farming." It costs you only a postal card to find out the facts.

Southwest and in California

—Chas. L. Beal reports that the Palo Alto, Cal., church building is the first of those severely damaged by the earthquake to be thoroughly repaired. Great credit for this is due the National C. W. B. M., that sent money for the repairs immediately after being notified of the amount required to restore the building. Two young people were baptized at prayer-meeting recently. The church is in a prosperous condition.

—George C. Ritchey, state evangelist of Idaho, closed a 27 days' meeting at Rupert, the 6th. Visible results, the organization of a church of 46 members, a Bible school of 70 pupils and a Christian Endeavor of 28 members. Of the new membership one came from the Catholic, three from the Mormons and three from the Baptists. Five came by confession and baptism. He is now in a meeting at Emmett, Idaho.

—H. D. Smith, of Kentucky, will assist Pastor N. M. Ragland in a meeting at Fayetteville, Ark., beginning October 15. Brother Ragland wishes to secure the services of a capable leader of song for these meetings. With such men as Ragland and Smith in the lead and the co-operation of such a church as the former has trained in Fayetteville for the past twenty years we will expect a great ingathering.

—H. Gale Spencer, of Morgantown, W. Va., has recently closed brief meetings at Friendly, Wick and Buffalo churches, W. Va. One result was to effect a co-operation between these congregations enabling them to call Thos. Knox, a recent graduate of the Lexington Bible College, into that field to serve as pastor. Brother Spencer received several into the churches and greatly emphasized "second principles."

—Henry F. Davis, of the committee on denominational co-operation, is circularizing the brotherhood in the interest of the State Interdenominational Sunday-school convention, to be held in Sedalia, Mo., August 28-30. It is earnestly desired that all our churches send the largest possible delegations to this convention. Since there are more members of the Churches of Christ in Missouri than of any other religious body we ought to excel all others in representation at gatherings like this.

—I. H. Fuller, of La Monte, closed a meeting in the Primitive Baptist church near La Monte, on the 12th. There were two confessions, two by statement, two from the Baptist and one reclaimed. He was assisted by Charles H. Altheide, of Bloomfield, Ia., whom he recommends very highly to the churches. It is hoped there will soon be enough Disciples in that community for the organization of a church. Brother Fuller will continue preaching in that vicinity until the church is established.

—Evangelist E. E. Violett is in a meeting that promises to become truly great, in his boyhood home at Winchester, Ill., assisting Pastor E. O. Sharpe. The latter writes: "Brother Violett is preaching magnificent sermons replete with learning, eloquence and persuasive power. I regard him the peer of any man in the evangelistic field, and if he wins twenty-five to Christ here, it will equal two hundred at almost any other place, for it is his home town and here as elsewhere is the Nazarene spirit." Two additions last week.

—Charles E. Smith, state evangelist of South Carolina, held a meeting recently at Walterboro, at which two were added by primary obedience. The congregation was so encouraged as to re-establish the regular observance of the Lord's supper. During the meeting Brother Smith was challenged for a debate by an Adventist, but after a friendly discussion all acrimony ceased and the challenger publicly wished our evangelist God-speed in his ministry of love and helpfulness. It is still true that a kind answer turneth away wrath.

—On the occasion of the laying of the corner stone for the new church edifice of the Central Church of Christ, Columbus, O., the pastor, Walter Scott Priest, delivered an address on "The One and Only Foundation," which the Editor has had the privilege of reading. He recently preached on the same subject in the Wesley Chapel of the M. E. Church of that city and the Methodist brethren were very hearty in their commendation of the sermon. It is a glorious fact that when it comes to Christ, as the one foundation, all Christians are in substantial accord.

—F. F. Walters, of Neosho, Mo., has concluded a very helpful meeting at Newtonia, Mo. There were sixty additions to the church, twenty-three by primary obedience, ten from the denominations and the balance restored fellowship. Brother Walters states that great credit for the success of this revival is due to E. J. Church, of Seneca, who holds services twice each month at Newtonia. The evangelist was a guest of Prof. S. C. Graves and family during the meeting. Brother Graves graduated from Bethany college during the presidency of Alexander Campbell and is a very ardent admirer of the great reformer.

—Edgar W. Allen has concluded his pastorate of nearly seven years with the West Jefferson Street Church, Fort Waye, Ind., and accepted a call to the Central, of Wichita, Kan. While at Fort Wayne he received 593 additions to the church. Thirty thousand dollars were raised for various purposes, $5,000 of which went to benevolences and missions. Two valuable and promising missions, having more than 100 members, were established in the county outside of the city. Brother Allen writes that Jefferson street church has a splendid past, but he modestly adds, "It has a more glorious immediate future."

—Prof. W. P. Howe, of Mt. Pleasant, Ia., sends us an account, taken from the "Daily Journal," of the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Toof, Memphis, Tenn. Brother Toof is president of one of the largest lithograph and printing establishments in the United States and a very zealous member of the Mississippi Avenue Christian Church. Sister Toof is a daughter of the late Daniel Bates, "who founded The Christian Evangelist, the chief exponent of the Christian Church in the United States and one of the ablest religious publications in the world." We trust the future will be full of golden days for these venerable and useful disciples of our Lord.

—R. H. Crossfield, of Owensboro, Ky., has just closed a meeting with the church at Chaplin, Ky., with forty-eight additions. Thirty-six were by confession and baptism, the others being added by letter and from the denominations. T. W. Harrison is the minister of the flock and is held in highest esteem. A bright future awaits such a capable and righteously ambitious young man. The music was in charge of Mrs. Beulah Barrick Steen, of Glasgow, Ky. Of her Brother Crossfield writes: "Much of the success of the meeting was due to her direction of the chorus and sympathetic solo work. Having known Mrs. Steen for fifteen years, I can unhesitatingly commend her Christian character and ability as a musician and director of revival music."

—The annual convention of our western Pennsylvania churches will be held at Homestead September 25-27. The morning and afternoon sessions will be held in the church, the evening meetings in Carnegie Hall. It has a seating capacity of over 1,200. It is confidently expected that with the growing interest in our churches in western Pennsylvania and the exceptionally strong program to be presented this hall's seating capacity will be taxed to its utmost. Wednesday evening will be "Pioneer Night," with addresses of Walter Carpenter, F. M. Gordon, and President Cramblet, of Bethany College, on "Walter Scott," "Barton W. Stone" and "Alexander Campbell," respectively. Pastor E. D. Salkald gives a hearty invitation to all Disciples who possibly can to attend this convention.

—Reduced railway rates have been secured for the Buffalo convention. Hotels now offer room and meals on the American plan for $2 per day and up; on the European plan, rooms for 50 cents, 75 cents, $1 and up. Boarding houses offer rooms for 50 cents and 75 cents; rooms and breakfast $1 and $1.50. Private houses offer rooms for 50 cents and 75 cents; room and breakfast 75 cents to $1. Special rates are offered to large parties stopping at one hotel. These low rates, together with those offered by the railways, will make it possible for thousands to attend, who would be barred by the usual prices. The splendid program and inspiration always derived from these great national gatherings will perhaps bring to Buffalo the largest convention attendance since the jubilee of 1900.

—Brother B. B. Tyler, always happy and hopeful, is now dwelling somewhere in the region of the third heaven, because of the steady and growing prosperity of the work under his charge. In a personal letter to the Editor under date of August 7, he writes: "Three months have passed since I returned to Denver from the Orient. During this time twenty-two persons have united with the South Broadway church—six by baptism, four by statement (almost more important than original conversions), and twelve by letter. These additions to the church were gained at our regular meetings. There has been no revival pressure. For May, June and July this is not bad. During this time the free-will offerings of the people, as the plates have been passed, Sunday after Sunday, have exceeded the amount needed to defray expenses, $419.95. I do not count contributions for other purposes. Is not this great? This surpasses any previous experience in my life! Where is the dead line? The congregations that I have served in the past, some at least, have borrowed money to tide over the summer. The summer is not ended, and the South Broadway church pays current expenses, gains twenty-two members, and accumulates a surplus of $419.95. Now, the next things are repairing the house of worship, the purchase of an organ and becoming a living link church. Praise the Lord!" There is no dead line, for either preacher or church that believes in Christ and keeps growing.

The Northern California Convention.

Our convention has left an afterglow that will ever be a beacon light to our sunny hills and verdant vales. The earthquake seemed to have loosened an extra number of brethren and sisters from their moorings, for there were more delegates representing churches than we have ever had before. The quantity of good all carried home with them depended on the size of the pitcher each one brought to the fountain. Every address was well prepared and as well delivered. The reports were the best in every respect.

The most noteworthy feature of the convention was the series of lectures by Prof. H. L. Willett, of Chicago University. He gave two lectures each day to large audiences, and from start to finish they were uplifting and inspiring. Every hearer ascended with him into the "Mountain of the Lord's House," there to feast on the good things, the Father and his Son has prepared for those that love him. Our Presbyterian brethren have secured a large parcel of land about ten miles from Santa Cruz, in the mountains, and christened it "Mount Hermon." They called Brother Willett to their assembly each day to lecture for them. During his lectures for us there were a hundred times more Bible readings than ever before. His good work and words were as bread cast upon the waters.

Sister Bertha Mason, the evangelist from Mexico, and national officer of our C. W. B. M., was another godsend to the brethren as well as the sisters of our coast.

Our C. W. B. M. of California north are making a record that will tell in volumes in eternity.

It was a delight to see so many Christian Endeavorers stringing down Garfield avenue at the ringing of the old Jerusalem bell to meet on Endeavor Rock for the sunrise prayer-meeting. Old and young met as young people, sang and prayed and talked together amid the chorus of the sea and acclaim from the rocks.

The Endeavorers will take scholarships in Berkeley Bible Seminary and help educate young men for the ministry. The last year has been another prosperous one for our Bible Seminary, and applications are being made from beyond the Rockies, and plans are being formulated for much more extended work for the coming year.

The Bible school sessions were presided over by Brother Picton, of Woodland, in a masterly manner. The devotional service each day was directed by Professor Van Kirk. So that the day opened with prayer and praise. It is enough to say that the music was directed by Prof. E. T. Nesbit and every one knows that it was a success.

Professor Elston, of Berkeley, is a most excellent chairman, and you would say the right man in the right place. It was a pleasure to see so many new men from the east panoplied for the California work and filled with enthusiasm to help us carry California for "Christ and the church." The writer has attended more California state meetings than any other living person, and I must say that as the moon waxed in brightness and the ocean waves swelled for high tide so did the sweet spirit, sympathy, love and enthusiasm rise to the highest. Every day you would feel that you were on the mountain of transfiguration.

Great improvements have been made about the park. Every lot has been sold, new cottages built, and two new railroads just outside our park on opposite sides. The reconstruction of the churches about the bay is a very anxious matter and we are in a shape to "go up and possess the land" if the good people of the east will help us. Everything is so favorable. Other religious bodies seeing this are on the alert and are responding liberally.—J. Durham.

Vancouver's War of the Roses.

Unbroken success is scarcely known in the progress of any one method of conduct. The contest revival in Sunday-school or Christian Endeavor has not always met with ready approval. It has not succeeded everywhere. In some societies it has ended in general disorder and scatterment rather than marshaling of forces. But this does not argue that the "War of Roses" is of no value anywhere if properly conducted. I have gone through several such conflicts and have, in every instance, witnessed splendid results, but no harm. Our last closed July 27 with a grand banquet in honor of the victorious side. For three months the "Silver" and the "Gold" worked earnestly and effectively. They saw a weak, dragging little society of twenty-seven irregular members rise to an enthusiastic organization of two hundred members. Men and boys who, for years had lost interest in every form of religious work are now in Sunday-school or attending mid-week prayer-meeting as well as Christian Endeavor.

The spirituality, promptness and general interest are improved 500 per cent.

The three monthly offerings during the contest amounted to over $460. One monthly offering was $309.05. The Endeavorers have started a building fund with $400. During its highest interest the auditorium was sometimes filled with all kinds of people. Such an interest was an excellent stimulus to a church that had been pastorless for several months, but set on foot again during my visit to Vancouver as state evangelist. At the close of my evangelistic work I took the pastorate here for six months. If I decide to go east I shall close here about October 1. Vancouver is within but six miles of Portland, Ore., beautifully located on the Columbia river. This great river is now being spanned by a railroad bridge here that may require two years in its construction. By the grace of God we hope the church will keep pace with the gradual boom of the city. I. Harvey Hazel.

Throw Away Medicines, Pills and Powders and Get a Bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine.

It is made from the luscious berries of the Saw-Palmetto tree. The Florida Indians used to extract from them what they called "Wine Medicine," and it did wonders for them. This wonderful remedy is not, in any sense of the word a medicine, but a pure, strengthening, restoring tonic from Nature's own storehouse, and it acts in Nature's own effective and harmless way. It purifies and enriches the blood, and imparts new life and vigor to every member and organ of the body. It rebuilds and renews the wasted tissues, and puts every part of the system in perfect condition to do its natural work, and thus ward off disease.

Constipation, Indigestion and all Stomach troubles, Kidney and Bladder troubles, torpid and sluggish Liver, Catarrh and Catarrhal diseases, all nervous disorders and affections, nervous weakness in men and women, all female weaknesses and diseases, and, in fact, all weakened and rundown conditions of the human system, are quickly relieved and permanently cured in a natural, safe, and positive way by Drake's Palmetto Wine.

You can get a usual dollar size bottle of any druggist for 75c, or, if you wish to try it before buying, write The Drake Company, Wheeling, W. Va., for a test bottle, which will be sent free and postpaid.

The Herbert Yeuell meeting, made possible by Brother Garrison's standing sponsor for the brotherhood's desire to have at least one church in New Hampshire patterned after the New Testament order, and for their generosity in supporting it, is perhaps the most memorable event in the religious annals of Manchester.

We are learning that our evangelist's modesty really prevented its being known here in the west what intense interest was created in the plea of this Restoration and how far reaching were the results of these preliminary services.

When he first entered the city it was a question whether he could secure a hearing and then whether his message would find any favor with the class of people who would make possible an enduring church.

These "whethers" are now cancelled out of the problem and "how great a start shall we give the new church" has taken their place.

Soon as the necessary funds are secured and some satisfactory local conditions are effected the present pastoral labors of Wm. C. Crerie will be supplemented by another great evangelistic campaign that will make the new church one of the prominent religious institutions of the city. The great need now is money. Each issue of this paper ought to contain a half column of donors to this sacred fund. Will not some double former gifts? Let all have part in this extension of the kingdom. Enroll your name on this scroll of honor. He gives double who gives quickly.

A New Christian College.

E. V. Zollars, former president of Hiram College, also of Texas Christian University, has been invited by the home missionary boards of Oklahoma and Indian Territory to visit the larger towns of the two territories and present to the brethren the necessity of establishing a school for the Christian church in the, soon to be, new state. President Zollars was greeted by a large audience at Woodward. The brethren here unanimously indorse his plans for establishing the school. President Zollars is the right man to take the great work placed upon him by the boards of the two territories. He is a profound scholar, a bringer of things to pass. His twenty-five years' experience in college and university work will be of help in this important undertaking. We of Oklahoma who know Professor Zollars believe that the hand of God led him here to direct us. Whenever God has a great work to be done he always sends the right man.—Ed. S. McKinney.

Illinois Notes.

The Newman church is one of the few in small cities, which by energy and wisdom, coupled with public spirit and liberality has forged to the front and holds its proper place of usefulness and religious power in the community. It built a new modern commodious brick house of worship which is greatly enjoyed by all from the least unto the greatest. It has been peculiarly fortunate in securing good ministers. Not far back in its history is our devoted L. R. Thomas and his talented wife. Then came the energetic J. G. McNutt, now doing such splendid work at Sullivan. Now they have the scholarly and talented O. L. Lyon, whose excellent ministry is greatly enjoyed by all. The church has been liberal in giving the minister the best possible evangelistic help. There seems to be an unusual proportion of active able helpers in the church. I have found few places with such a fine combination for success in full use. It is not surprising, therefore, that the church numbers nearly 400 members, with a Sunday-school enrolling about 250, a C. E. of 70, a Junior C. E. of 40, a strong C. W. B. M., and observes all public calls for offerings "Education Day," of course, among the rest.

George H. Brown is getting the work well in hand at Charleston. This is one of our old churches. Here Alexander Campbell preached in an early day. Here B. B. Tyler held one of his first pastorates. Other strong men followed. F. W. Burnham, W. F. Shaw and Brother Brown bringing the work up-to-date. They have a good house, a large, influential membership with all the auxiliaries well developed and in fine working order. Every great enterprise of the church should thrill with the magnificent power of this church which has been so wonderfully blest.

At Mattoon D. N. Wetzel, one of our choice men has labored four months with several additions, and ever increasing popularity with the people. The church numbers more than 500 souls, has a S. S. of 300, a C. E. of more than 100 and a Junior of 70, and a large C. W. B. M. The final $2,000 of indebtedness on their excellent church edifice has been provided for since Brother Wetzel took charge of the work, and all are looking forward to still larger things for the Master. The policy of the church is to keep in live and efficient touch with all our great enterprises by having sermons and offerings for them all.

The convention of the Seventh District of Illinois was held with the splendid church at Carmi, Aug. 7-9. The district includes 22 counties reaching across the state from East St. Louis to the Wabash, containing 200 churches with 18,000 members and with about 77 preachers. It is the largest district in the state and has more Disciples in it than any other district except the Sixth.

The C. W. B. M. has 21 auxiliaries in it which raised $500 the past year for the general treasury and for state development. Mrs. Minnie M. Daily of Olney, is district secretary and presided over the meetings with dignity and in a business-like way. Miss Anna E. Davidson of Eureka, state president, Miss Lura V. Thompson, state secretary, and Miss Clara B. Griffin, superintendent of children's work, were all present, which insured a splendid convention. Reports were encouraging, addresses optimistic and plans for future vigorous. The chief address was by Miss Davidson on "Our Centennial." She has already the just reputation of being one of the best speakers in all the ranks of the C. W. B. M. and this address was one of the best. Her clear voice and accurate articulation make her clearly heard to the remotest corner.

The regular missionary work of the District was done chiefly by Lew D. Hill who gave some ten months to the work, who added about 75 to the churches and did much other work. About 75 churches made offerings to state work, aggregating about $700.

The convention was attended by about twenty preachers and fifty other delegates all of whom had free entertainment by the generous Carmi church.

The chief addresses all meritorious and carefully prepared were delivered by W. H. Boles, Marion Stevenson, J. W. Kilburn, L. D. Hill, C. C. Garrigues, H. H. Peters, W. Henry Jones, J. Fred Jones, E. U. Smith, R. Leland Brown and Jesse Story. It is hard to leave these efficient speakers with this simple announcement, but want of space demands it. J. K. Dickinson, a business man from Lawrenceville, was president, who also gave a most practical address and led the convention with promptness and wisdom. We ought to have more of our business men in all our conventions.

"Christian Education" also very properly had a place on the program. Indeed the college in Illinois is coming to be recognized as a most radical and essential necessity for the growth of our work. The convention unanimously voted that the churches encourage their young people to attend Eureka College and also observe "Education Day" January 20, 1907. Southern Illinois has sent to Eureka College a large number of splendid young men. J. T. Alsup and R. L. Beshers, David Husband, S. S. Lappin and his two brothers, J. C. and W. O., K. C. Ventress, J. C. Hall, H. H. Peters, Finis Idleman, E. J. Hart and many others. Several are now in college from Southern Illinois and more are coming. Brother Hart brought into the churches about 4,000 souls. How many a young man wastes what might be a great life because he fails to put himself under proper environments and training in his youth.

The officers for the Seventh District for the coming year are Pres. J. F. Rosborough, Vice-Pres. C. C. Garrigues, Sec. C. M. Smithson and Treas. J. W. Kilburn. A vice-president was also selected in each county to co-operate with the board and form a part of it. The next convention goes to Mt. Vernon. This is central and ought to be a great convention. If all the churches in the district would take offerings, every preacher be active in co-operation, what a great work a year would mean. Brethren, we look to you for great things for Christ and his cause.—J. G. Waggoner, Eureka, Ill.

TEXAS LAND BARGAIN.

I have just purchased 6,400 acres of fine land in Southwest Texas and only need about half of it for my own use. I had to buy the whole tract to get any of it and can hardly afford to cultivate all of it myself. I will sacrifice the surplus, selling in any size tracts at your own terms. It is all fine land, and purchasers may look it over and take their pick—it is all good, so I do not care which part of it I keep. It will pay to investigate this, as I want to sell quick to get cash to cultivate part left to me. Write for full information. GEO. L. COLBURN,

A Good Report.

On last Sunday L. J. Marshall closed his fourth year of work with the church at this place. During the last eleven months there have been fifty-eight additions to the church. The Bible school has increased about one-third; all missionary interests have been remembered, the church giving in all about $1,800 to missions. A lot has been purchased costing over $8,000, and money will be raised during the year for the erection of a new church house. Brother Marshall is now on his annual vacation and will return about September 1. We are planning greater things.

An Improved College Property.

Toward the end of last autumn the main building of South Kentucky College was destroyed by fire. It is now being rebuilt and is nearing completion. It is greatly improved in architecture both interior and exterior. A new dormitory for young ladies is also nearing completion.

The school has new plans of interest. Most notable among these is its plan to give board and tuition each year to two young men preparing for the ministry. Those scholarly Christian gentlemen, Pres. A. C. Kuy Krudall and Vice-Pres. H. Clay Smith, are to continue in their respective positions. A full faculty of other teachers will assist them. The fall term will open on Sept. 11, at which time the builders have promised that the new buildings will be ready for occupancy.

Walden's Meetings.

There is still unspoken for enough of G. T. Walden's time, while he will be in America, for two meetings—one to begin September 9, the other immediately after the general convention. Brother Walden is one of our best preachers, a man of pleasing manners, and a most earnest and tactful worker. After graduating at Lexington in 1888, where he took the honors of his class, he went to Lygon St., Melbourne, then our largest church in Australia; in 1892 he succeeded W. T. Moore at the West London Tabernacle; in 1896 he was compelled to go to Australia on account of the health of one of his children, and took the work at Enmore, Sydney, where he has been ten years. During this time the church has been enlarged twice to accommodate the growing congregation. He is president of the C. E. Union of Australia with a membership of 85,000; as such he has attended this summer the British convention at Leeds, and the World's C. E. convention at Geneva, Switzerland. During his visit in England he has had an audience with King Edward and has presented him with a boomerang from his loyal aboriginal subjects in New South Wales.

Altogether Brother Walden is a man of rare qualities. He loves to preach and is very successful in winning souls. He devotes much of his time to protracted meeting work in Australia—mission work as it is called there. He will have reached New York about August 9. I shall be glad to hear from any churches desiring his services. He may be addressed personally in my care.

NEWS FROM MANY FIELDS

Western Pennsylvania Letter.

Work in western Pennsylvania is moving steadily forward, despite the extreme heat and the fact of vacation season being upon us. Brother Tharp with Bro. Z. T. Sweeney is fishing in Michigan. We expect considerable "ictheology" when vacation season ends.——T. A. Bright, of Waynesburg, Pa., is looking after the Allegheny work during August.——Brother Slater and family are spending the month in central Ohio, and President Cramblet, of Bethany, is holding forth in the East End during his absence.——Brother and Sister Place, of Bellevue, are in Bowling Green, O.——Bro. Jean Duty, a ministerial boy from the Wilkensburg church, supplied in Bellevue Sunday.——Grant E. Pike, of Shady avenue, Albany, is raising money to clear the mortgage and preparing for publication a large work on baptism—good substantial work for this season.——The Thurgoods, of Central church, are just home from their vacation.——Brother Manley is booming things in Belmar.——F. M. Gordon preaches all summer in his new church in Knoxville.——Bro. Garnett Wynne has just taken up his work in Hazelwood. Five accessions are reported for last Sunday. The work is in a hopeful and most promising condition.——S. E. Brewster, of McKees Rocks, with his family leave next week for a visit in the east. The mission bee is buzzing in his bonnet and he is investigating a point of great promise near his own church.——McKeesport under Brother Howard Cramblet is making preparations for a great meeting this fall.——Brother Pitman has just gotten hold of the reins at Dravosburg and we look for great things there.——Of course Homestead is booming. Ed. Salkeld makes everything go. He is very busy preparing for the entertainment of our fall convention.——J. A. Joyce recently preached a few evenings at "Nadine," a new point on the Allegheny River. Seven disciples were found and two responded to the gospel invitation. Brother Joyce is pushing that most estimable book, "The Church of Christ," by "A Layman." Don't fail to read it.——They are talking parsonage in Scottdale, where Bro. M. C. Frick, though no longer a young man, is pushing the work enthusiastically. His son, C. H. Frick, who has just graduated from Hiram, is now on the field as Western Pennsylvania evangelist. He is at present prospecting among the most promising mission fields. He is strong, earnest and enthusiastic and will be a great accession to our Western Pennsylvania work.——J. D. Dabney is closing his second and most successful year on Herron Hill.——R. S. Lattimer, our Western Pennsylvania veteran president, is enjoying the surf at Bethany Beach, and helping all visitors to enjoy themselves.——Time and space will not permit what I should like to say of E. A. Hibler and his splendid work in Johnstown. He has just dedicated a most beautiful and perfectly equipped building, the best one among our people in the state. Brother Hibler is among our oldest (in point of service) pastors in the state and few, if any, have done a greater work than he.——O. H. Philips, the veteran pastor of Braddock, has just refused a most tempting call from one of Ohio's best churches. We all rejoice in his loyalty to West Pennsylvania. He will be one of our leaders in preparation for the centennial meeting here.——The writer has just returned from a ten days' visit in Canada. He recently addressed the Ohio Valley Endeavor rally at Bellaire, O., and will make the evening address at the international Christian Endeavor rally in Columbia county, O., on August 24. After five years' service we have resigned our work in Wilkinsburg, and accepted a call to East Orange, N. J., where we begin September 1. Will also do graduate work in Columbia University, New York city. Bro. George W. Knepper, of Somerset, has been called as my successor and will be on the field October 1.—L. N. D. Wells.

North Carolina Notes.

W. G. Walker, state evangelist, had a long, hard siege at Durham, where he held the fort for about seven weeks. He knew of only three Disciples when he went there. There were many hindrances, but they organized a congregation of 22 members. McKinney was his singing evangelist, and Brother Walker speaks highly of him and his work.

W. G. Johnson, late of Roanoke, Va., was to hold a meeting at Stoneville in July. Have not heard results.——The writer held a meeting at Mathews Chapel, seven miles from Winston, beginning July 22 and closing July 29. We have but about half a dozen members in this congregation, a good many having moved away. No additions, but the interest seemed revived.——On Lord's day, July 29, had five additions at Winston. Two were baptized, one from Louisville, Ky., a grand nephew of Isaac Errett. One sister came by letter. Her husband, a Baptist, came with her. A very cheering announcement was made, that the last note on our debt to the Church Extension Board was paid. The debt was $900 at Christmas, 1905. That with interest has been paid within the year. We will have a mortgage burning later.——The district co-operation meeting in this section will be held at Winston beginning Friday before fifth Lord's day in August.——The church at Winston has granted me, without asking for it, a vacation during August. Part of the time is being spent at my mother's home, Bellaire, O. While here I read in a Steubenville, O., paper that "a contract has been let for the construction and equipment of the road ready to turn over to the company for operation." That is, the electric road from Wellsburg to Bethany. This will be a great advantage to Bethany College.—J. A. Hopkins.

July State Mission Work in Kentucky.

The month of July found L. B. Haskins at work half his time at Erlanger, with well sustained interest in the work. A meeting is expected the last of September, in which W. J. Cocke will assist.——Professor W. H. Cord was helped at Cannel City in a meeting by E. J. Willis and there were eight baptisms. The people enjoyed the preaching very much and the cause was helped.——S. J. Short spent twenty-three days in the Big Sandy valley, added five and visited four places.——W. J. Cocke preached twenty-five sermons during July, added nine, raised in cash and pledges for Kentucky missions, $216.10.——D. G. Combs was in Fleming and Carter counties, added 41 and did much general work.——W. J. Dodge reports the work at Jackson as moving on in the usual way. He is making special effort now to raise the balance he pledged to raise on dedication day.——W. C. McCallum says that the Valley View mission is encouraging. He gives half time to this field.——Latonia continues to give H. C. Runyon audiences that overtax the capacity of house. One added Effort being made to get a larger lot and plans on foot to enlarge house or build new one.——Leslie county had the services of J. W. Masters for a meeting in July; twenty-three added; $19 for Kentucky missions. He expects to go to Hyden, the county seat for a meeting in October. We have a number of people in that remote county; but if we have any house of worship it is unknown to the writer.——South Louisville has had the services of Edw. B. Richey nearly all the past month. He was in a meeting at West Point for several days. Building progressing well.——The pews for Jellico house of worship are ordered for October, and Wren J. Grinstead thinks that the house will be dedicated soon after that.——G. W. Adkins baptized one and added one otherwise. He is out for a summer campaign in eastern Kentucky.——C. M. Summers reports work at Pikeville as doing well. He helped H. H. Thomson in a meeting out in the county and there were twenty-three baptized.——There were seven added in the work of H. L. Morgan in southeastern Kentucky and other general work reported.——F. M. Stamper reports eighteen added during the past four months in Morgan and Wolfe counties. He is helped by the Hubble church, through the state board.——H. W. Elliott was at work all the month in the interest of state missions. He collected $298.59—just about one-half enough to pay the expenses of the month. We had just such a shortage in June and hence we are more than a month behind. We trust that this month will witness a general coming up on the part of many churches and individuals. To close the year as we ought we must have about $4,000. If all the churches that have not done so will pay their apportionments in full we can compass this and go to Louisville September 24-27 with a smile on our faces and joy in our hearts.——Our plan of entertainment is different this year from any convention in our history. The Louisville people will give us lodging and breakfast and we will pay for our dinner and supper. This will give our brethren with whom we meet a better opportunity to enjoy and profit by the convention.——A rate of one fare plus 25 cents, on the round trip ticket plan has been secured on all except two railroad lines. It is confidently expected by the Louisville brethren having this matter in charge that these will also give same plan and rate.——R. M. Hopkins will be largely in charge of affairs and will be helped by a thorough organization for taking care of the great crowd that we confidently expect to see gathered at Louisville September 24-27.

Sulphur, Ky. H. W. ELLIOTT, Sec.

A Wonderful Machine.

So many and varied have been the wonders produced by the inventive genius of man that, as an Irishman would say, there are no wonders.

That which would have been regarded as marvelous a generation ago, is only common-place now. And yet it is remarkable how the mechanical knowledge of the race has kept pace (and at times seemingly, led) the needs of a growing civilization. No sooner has a want announced itself to the world than genius responds with that which satisfies.

One of the most interesting and practical devices for economizing energy and securing accuracy is called to the attention of the readers of this journal, in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. We refer to the advertisement of the Standard Adding Machine in another part of the paper. This device, scarcely as large as a typewriter, enables one to add from the smallest to the largest amounts with great rapidity and absolute and unfailing accuracy. It is valuable, not only in banks and large offices, but in the accounting department of the ordinary merchant. The Standard Adding Machine has a peculiar interest for readers of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, because it was invented by W. W. Hopkins, a minister of the Christian Church, and at one time office editor of this paper. The president of the company which makes the machine is F. M. Call, formerly business manager and treasurer of the Christian Publishing Company. E. J. Ganz, another of our well known brothers from the preaching ranks, has charge of the sales department, and in the office force, the salesmen and the stock-holders the membership of the Christian Church is well represented. The Christian Publishing Company has used a Standard Adding Machine for ten months, with no need for repairs, and has found it almost indispensible, although it doubted that it had need at all for it when first induced to try it.

Readers who are engaged in business of any kind will obtain very full information concerning the way in which the machine can be of help to them by writing for booklet. As may be judged from what has been written above, mention of the fact that they are readers of this paper will secure for their communications especial attention.

Callaway County (Mo.) Convention.

Owing to rain the convention convened August 8 instead of 7, and continued to the 10th. The opening sermon was preached by C. H. Caton, of Columbia, Mo. Among the preachers and church workers participating were H. N. McKee, W. J. Lhamon and C. H. Caton of Columbia, Pastor Ainsworth, of Dixie church, County Evangelist Cunningham, Dr. F. J. Nichols, president of the convention, Egan Herndon, of Centralia, and the writer.

It was a good convention. Dr. F. J. Nichols, C. O. Adkinson and S. T. Moore were elected to constitute the county board for the ensuing year. The next convention will be held with the Hickory Grove church in the northwest part of the county, about August 1, 1907.

The cause in Callaway county is in a healthy condition, with a few symptoms of disorder in spots. Co-operation between churches occupying contiguous territory was discussed and recommended. It has been tried in the county, and has much in its favor.

A vigorous administration by the county board during the year will mean much for our people in the county. The next convention, in my humble judgment, should be planned for months ahead. It should be a convention of Callaway churches. Every church should send several delegates, with full reports of the work. The work of the churches should be the burden of the convention. Plans should be presented by competent workers, every department of the church should be studied, missions should be emphasized, and less time should be consumed by sermons. The people enjoy sermons; but they need other things as well. If outside speakers are invited they ought to be assigned subjects that relate to the needs of the county. The Disciples of the Kingdom have a right to expect the county board to plan carefully and vigorously for the best convention the county ever had for next year.—C. A. Lowe, St. Joseph Mo.

India Notes.

July 9th was the 200th anniversary of the beginning of Protestant missions in India. The Danes at that time arrived in the port of Tranquebar, but apparently did not land until the 11th. Then they met with a rebuff from the native king and were compelled to stand outside his gates until afternoon. All over India this anniversary was celebrated, in some places on the 9th and in others on the 11th. Our celebration was on the 11th. The station theater was engaged for the event. The stage was occupied by the missionaries, the speakers, and a few invited guests. The auditorium was filled with native Christians, of whom 500 or 600 were present. All the missions in Jubbulpore were represented on the program. Several of the missionaries made brief addresses, and five minute speeches were made by four native Christians; one a convert from Mohammedanism, one a convert from Hinduism, one a famine waif brought up in an orphanage, and one born, as he expressed it, into the Church of England. The most interesting speech made by any of these was that made by the Hindu convert, who, in an enthusiastic address, declared that the power of caste, which is the back bone of heathenism, was broken, and that the system was falling to the ground, and that in numerous respects, some of which he illustrated, Hindus and Mohammedans were imitating Christians, by establishing prayer-meetings and publication societies, and opening schools and orphanages. But none of these, he thought, could stop the advance of Christianity. We are having a summer school for our mission helpers, in connection with the Bible college. Those assisting in giving instruction, in addition to the writer, are Messrs. Grainger, McGavran, Adams, and Menzies. Twenty evangelists are present from our several stations, and four lectures are delivered daily. We are doing all we can to emphasize the great text, "Preach the Word." We feel, from the interest manifested that much good is being accomplished. The Bible college will begin its regular work on the 23d. We look for an increase of students over last year's number. Our little Hindi paper, started with four and then eight pages, has proved so useful that we are now enlarging it to twelve pages weekly. The readers are much pleased with it, and are crying for its enlargement. It is the only periodical that most of our subscribers get.—Geo. W. Brown, Jubbulpore.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they can not reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

MISSOURI CHRISTIAN COLLEGE FOR GIRLS

The Oldest Institution of the Christian Church in Missouri

Departments—English, Modern and Ancient Languages, Music, Art, Elocution, Cooking and Sewing.

Fifty-eighth session opens September 12, 1906.

Out of the city in small country town, yet within easy access—30 miles—of Kansas City and Saint Joseph, Mo. Combines Happy, Refined Home Life with Thorough Educational Training. Each girl receives constant personal attention and association of her teachers. The sympathetic help and encouragement which nerves to renewed effort and turns despair and defeat into hope and victory. No girl is neglected in the crush of numbers. Discipline is kind, yet almost military in strictness, because largely enforced by the loyal high moral sentiment of the students themselves. In charge of a Faculty of Experienced Teachers trained in the best Institutions of the country.

Take a view of this Old Institution as seen by friends:

Prof. Barham, Camden Point, Mo.:

My Dear Sir.—I desire to express to you my satisfaction with the progress of my daughter, who has attended your school during this school year. I am highly pleased with the school. It seems to be thorough in instruction and is on a high moral plane. I know of no school where young ladies can receive more consideration than at yours. May you continue to prosper is my fondest wish. Yours,

EMMETT B. FIELDS,
President Pro Tem Missouri State Senate,
Forty-third General Assembly.

St. Joseph, Mo., May 12, 1905.

Any young girl is fortunate who finds herself able to spend a few of the short, happy years of her school life in Missouri Christian College. Professor Barham's thorough understanding of his profession, and his earnest appreciation of the responsibility of his position make him an ideal director of the work. Mrs. Barham's quick, sympathetic understanding impresses each pupil with the feeling that she is her personal friend; and her bright, happy disposition and wholesome views of life make it a pleasure to study under her direction. I can not too heartily endorse Missouri Christian College. MRS. R. M. GOODE,
Pres. C. W. B. M. in Mo.

It is a pleasure to recommend The Missouri Christian College of Camden Point. It is located in one of our best communities, away from the crowded centers, in the pure atmosphere of a beautiful country town, a very favorable atmosphere for the development of scholarship and character. In its location its social surroundings and its instruction this school offers very exceptional advantages for those seeking a school for their daughters.

Ten Per Cent Off.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

In your issue of June 21st is an excellent article by Brother Cupp on Ministerial Dignity. He is strongly opposed to a minister accepting the usual 10 per cent discount on his purchases. I am unable to see anything wrong in a preacher accepting a courtesy of this kind. Of course, a preacher ought not to ask for a discount. But if a discount is offered I see no impropriety in accepting it. Nearly all of us accept fifty per cent off on our purchases of railroad tickets and we even make application for our clergy certificates. I admit that a preacher ought not to ask for a ten per cent discount on purchases, but I contend that there is nothing undignified in accepting it when offered. It would be improper for me to ask a man whom I meet on the street to give me $5. But should he hand me $5, I see no impropriety in accepting it. Brother Cupp says that the world calls it graft. Probably some of them do so call it. But I have not heard it called graft except by people who call the minister's salary graft. I have heard ten times more objection to taking an incidental collection than I have heard to a preacher accepting a per cent on his purchases. Is it inconsistent to accept 10 per cent off of our purchases from our merchants and at the same time consistent to accept fifty per cent off from a railroad corporation? Some of the best Christian business men whom I know offer a per cent off to ministers, and I see no impropriety in accepting it. T. D. SECREST.

Procrastination.

To the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:

We have two more confessions to report since our meeting closed. One under very sad circumstances. A young man of exceptionally good habits who attended our meetings some but did not confess the Savior at that time. He complained some on Tuesday, a physician was called on Wednesday, an operation was deemed necessary on Thursday, and he died in Atlanta about midnight of Friday. Before his death he asked for me, but it was not possible to reach him. Another minister was called, with whom he talked, saying that he had known his duty for years, but his stubborn will had kept him from making the good confession. He repeated the tweny-third Psalm, prayed for himself and those about him and went into eternity asking that his name be placed among the list of those who had accepted Christ during our meeting. A large and very attentive audience listened to a talk by the writer from Rom. 8:35. We tried to show that while the love of Christ was inexhaustible, there was danger in delay. Many wept and many said that it was the most impressive moment in their lives. May the God and Father of us all help that we may profit by this sad lesson.

Elliott, Iowa. SAM B. ROSS.

The question raised is a very delicate one and can rarely be discussed at a funeral without lacerating sad hearts. But may this inspire us to preach with new fervor that now is the accepted time.—S.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting

August 22, 1906.

FINDING OUR LIFE CALLING—
Acts 9:6-20.

"To the work, to the work,
  We are servants of God,
We will follow the path
  That our Saviour hath trod;
With the balm of his counsel
  Our strength to renew,
We will do with our might
  What our hands find to do."

Saul no sooner learned his life calling than he entered upon it. He obeyed the voice, "And straightway in the synagogues he proclaimed Jesus that he is the Son of God." All altruistic impulses in harmony with the Word may safely be interpreted as life callings, and our disposition of them is their acceptance or rejection. Let us be Sauls rather than Jonahs, good soldiers and not renegades.

Persistency is an essential to the achievement of success in any calling. One man abandons a mine when just another stroke of the pick would have uncovered a wealth of gold. Had the patriots made one more charge, the invaders had been routed and liberty won. Through lack of patient continuance in well-doing many a life that otherwise would have become nobly distinguished has fallen back to the commonplace.

We have found our life calling when we see the field of greatest usefulness for which our natural endowments qualify us. That calling is not only to be good and do good, but to be the best and do the greatest good we can. It should be remembered, too that true honor consists not so much in what good work we engage as in the character of our work. In doing well the humblest tasks we have fellowship with the greatest works of God.

James and John, Peter and Andrew heard the call and left their nets. Matthew heard it at the receipt of custom and quitted his office. Saul heard it before the gates of Damascus, and at its command entered the way of martyrdom and glory, and they all are among the nobility of the church. Demas heard and forsook the way. Felix listened and trembled. It came to Agrippa, and he was almost persuaded. The priest and Levite were called, but turned and passed by on the other side. May we not only hear the calling to a life of service, but in all things obey it.

We are all called to be Christians, and being a Christian should be our chief employ. Music is the vocation of the musician. He may devote some time to gardening or painting as avocations, but if he ever excels as a musician, he must give himself chiefly to that art. Our vocation is being Christians. As avocations we may sell goods or peg shoes, but if we win divine approval we will be known in the community as Christians rather than merchants or cobblers, nor will we at any time more faithfully illustrate our high calling than when engaged in our avocations.

Miracles never supplant the more usual processes in the fulfillment of God's plans; they merely supplement them. The miracle brought Saul who wanted to know, into touch with Ananias, who could inform him. Rarely is such a miracle needed now, for men have learned not to expect special revelations from the skies when they wish to learn of their religious duties and privileges, but to confer with modern saintly Ananiases, who can instruct them in the ways of the Lord more perfectly. It is something to be greatly encouraged. We ought to talk more about the Kingdom. How rarely do we have our conversation in heaven!

While Spanish is the language spoken by all save the lowest tribes of our insular wards, they readily learn English in the public schools. Their labor is more valuable, they are faring better than before, our merchants are teaching them to get, our missionaries are inspiring them to be. They are not of the dying races. Those helping in their development are having part in the making of nations that will yet prove important factors in the destiny of the earth for good or evil.

In the Philippines the various churches have recognized "spheres of influence," having divided the territory among themselves so there would be no confusion of doctrines among the natives or any denominational clashes. There is less difference in denominational teachings on the mission fields than at home, however. The heathen take little interest in theology; they hunger for the Bread of Life. The Christian unity we all so desire will probably come to us via our island missions.

Our Bro. G. D. Edwards, of Honolulu, writes letters full of hope for the future of the churches of Christ in Hawaii. The natives are naturally religious and those won to the Saviour love him with their whole heart. But this is rapidly becoming a modern and metropolitan city, and there he is preaching the old Gospel to men of many nations. A gracious courtesy would be for many Endeavorers to write Brother and Sister Edwards messages of Christian sympathy and cheer.

The justification of our seizure of the Spanish islands will not be produced in commercial circles or political councils, but by the churches. The merchant will try to sell them more than he buys; the politician's services in governing them will not be gratuitous; only the church will give to them, asking nothing. Public sentiment may have supported traders and office-seekers in this conquest, but this sentiment is wrong unless we confer on those islanders greater spiritual blessings than they could otherwise have enjoyed.

Protestantism has 29 preaching stations in Porto Rico, and 11 organized churches. There are 1,089 members affiliated with the different churches. Of the 15 Protestant ministers on the island, two are supported by churches of Christ. This may not seem like much progress during the past five years, but these statistics may make known to us how great is the problem of preparing these peoples for heaven and stimulate us to greater endeavors in behalf of a race whose souls, in part, shall be required of us.

We do not think of the Samoans as being far advanced in Christian culture. They may not be scholastic theologians, but they are vastly superior to theologians only—they are Christian missionaries. Already they have gone to the less fortunate Fiji natives and told them of the heavenly Father and the Saviour. They are dispelling their superstitious fears with the knowledge of the Bible; they are overcoming their fierceness with gentleness like that of Jesus; they are frescoing their thoughts of the future with scenes of purity, love and joy.

Lowell McPherson, a classmate of the writer, formerly of Jefferson street Christian Church, Buffalo, is reported by many who have visited Havana as being the most influential non-official citizen of Cuba. He is known throughout the Antilles, and has the unbounded confidence of rulers and people. It is said he is the most useful man on the island. These honors have not come to him through political preferment, nor have they been bought with gold. He went there resolving to be Christ's man to those people who knew so little of the true Christ, and the result is he is helping to transfigure thousands into the likeness of Christ.

THE RICH YOUNG RULER.—Mark 10:17-31.

Memory verses: 23, 24.

Golden Text.—If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me.—Matt. 16:24.

This story of the rich young ruler has all the pathos of a great opportunity lost, of a great talent wasted, of a great gain missed by a narrow margin. The keyword of it, perhaps, is "almost."

If we may read between the lines, we will say that this young man was sincerely interested in the great Teacher and sincerely desirous of bettering his own moral and spiritual condition if possible. He was fully aware of his own virtues, however. His inquiry of Jesus was made quite respectfully and sincerely, perhaps a trifle condescendingly, as from one already sure of his own excellence and expecting rather approval than any advice radically at variance with his established mode of life. Certainly it was made in a cautious and tentative way. He was not putting himself without reserve under the guidance of Jesus, but was proposing to get his advice and then use it in so far as it agreed with his own views. This last point was one of his chief failings. One can not profitably consult a physician or a lawyer in that spirit. Much less can one get the blessing which Christ has to give by approaching him in that hesitant and untrusting manner.

He was a good young man. He may have been conceited, but he was evidently virtuous and there was about him a winsomeness which made the Master love him. His virtue and the lovable qualities of his character were a solid asset of great value. They were not final values, but they constituted a great opportunity. The possession of them did not (to use the common phrase) "save" him, but it gave him an opportunity to be saved.

The advice which Jesus gave him—to sell his great possessions and give the proceeds to the poor—discovered the lurking defect of his character. He clung to his goods with the grip of avarice. More than that, he showed himself unwilling to pay the price required for companionship with Jesus. He wanted to enter the kingdom of God—if it could be done without serious inconvenience. He had never yet come to the cross-roads where virtue and prosperity part company. So when the alternative was presented, to continue in the enjoyment of his wealth or to gain the fellowship of the Master, he chose his wealth.

It does not follow that Jesus meant this advice for a general command to all his followers. Different persons need different tests, as different patients need different prescriptions. Jesus was not laying down a universal command in these words. But he indicated a general moral principle, which was that trusting in wealth makes wealth a barrier to the kingdom of God.

The young man "went away sorrowful." Why? Not at giving up his riches, for he did not give them up. But at giving up Jesus. He had come within the magic circle of his influence and had caught some glimpse of the glory of the better life that he might have with the Master. He had heard the call, but it did not quite command his obedience. He had lost his old content of possession and failed to gain the new joy of sacrifice and service. Such is ever the fate of those who see and do not follow the heavenly vision.

Our Great Agreements.

Here I stopped and remarked that the list was getting to be a long one, and yet we had not by any means exhausted our agreements. I suggested that we write down some of our disagreements. He gave his assent and we began:

1. "We disagree on apostolic succession."

2. "We disagree on the subject of baptism." I said to him that as I understood it he believed in baptismal regeneration, pouring and sprinkling and infant baptism. He replied that I had stated it correctly.

3. "We disagree about the name of the church." He thought that the name "Church of England" was all right.

4. "We disagree in regard to the priestly function of the ministry, the rubric and ritual of the church."

Here I hesitated and said, "I am about to run out of disagreements." I asked him to name some of the things about which we were not likely to agree. He replied that he did not think of any other.

"Now," I said, "let us look at our two lists and compare them. In the first place we see that in actual count there is a two-thirds majority in favor of our agreements. In the second place we must weigh and measure as well as count. Here are ten agreements to four disagreements. If we put all four of these disagreements together, they are not to be compared in weight or importance to any one of the ten on the other side where we agree."

The chaplain very pleasantly replied, "I never looked at it in that way before." "But," he said, "tell me about this Endeavor society. What is it? What does it mean? What does it do?" I explained something of its nature and history and handed him a copy of the constitution and a tract by Dr. Clark. Before leaving he consented for me to propose his name, and in two weeks he lead one of the meetings beautifully, being the first chaplain of the Church of England in India to become a member of the Christian Endeavor Society.

I think this chaplain learned something from our conference that morning. I believe, however, that I learned more than he did. Among the important lessons I learned anew were these:

1. The importance of the great agreements among Protestants.

Many a time I had said that Protestant agreements were greater and more important than their disagreements, but I had not realized what that meant. Here was a high churchman and a no churchman at all discovering that they were one in all the great essentials of the Christian faith. We had looked each other in the face in front of our ten great agreements. Supposing such a conference had been held with a Presbyterian or Methodist or Baptist. The agreements would have been much increased and the disagreements greatly lessened.

2. The great sin of divisions in the church.

"Let there be no divisions among you," comes with a new force as we study the meaning of our great agreements. Let us make real to ourselves the great fact even as Abraham stated, "We are brethren." In the mind of Jesus this is fundamental, "One is your Master; all ye are brethren." There is no justification for sectarianism. There is no sane reason for division. Refusing to unite with all who believe in Jesus notwithstanding some disagreements on other items is treason to the prayer of Jesus and shows blindness of vision and cruelty of heart. When the earthquake and fire came, San Francisco could easily federate. When Christians have vision and heart, when they see and feel things as they are, they also can and will unite, co-operate, federate, anything else but separate. In view of our great agreements and the great danger and destruction of sin and Satan, we must work and fight together under the same Leader and overcome our common enemy.

3. The great agreements are the highways of approach to perfect union.

"Can two walk together except they be agreed?" By the recognition of our agreements, not only as respects the great fundamental facts of Christianity, but also our agreements in the heart experiences of salvation and spiritual life, the way will be paved for a profitable discussion of any disagreements we may have as brethren in the same church or between separate churches. May it not be that Christian union will come from traversing lovingly this highway of truth and love which leads to life and heaven? We can never argue down or overcome our disagreements by ignoring or being false to our great agreements. Christian love is the first and greatest step towards Christian union.

THE MAN AND THE MASTER, by James E. Freeman. (Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, N. Y. 75 cents.)

This is a valuable blending of the life of Jesus—the Son of God and the Son of David. The studies relate to His Boyhood and Home, to Jesus the Workman, Teacher, Reformer, Friend, Liberator, Savior. While there is no compromise of his sovereignty and divinity, his humanness is vividly exploited, his experiences become most inspirational and a walk with him one of our sweetest privileges. It is an inexpensive but valuable book of 127 pages.

EVANGELISM, by G. Campbell Morgan, 99 pages, price not given.

Five addresses delivered to students in theological seminaries. Morgan is a prophet of God. He is at his best in these addresses, and like a good scribe brings from his spiritual storehouse things both new and old. He discusses "The Evangel," "The Church Evangelistic," "The Evangelistic Service," and "The Present Opportunity." The New Evangelism is thus disposed of: "Why not pray for an old fashioned revival? Because I want God's next new thing. Then why not forecast the lines of a new evangelism? Because one evangel is enough for all time." The work of the evangelist is thus described: "The business of the evangelist is to get an immediate verdict for Jesus Christ." I repeat, it is the message of a prophet. Let every preacher buy and read this booklet.

THE PASSION FOR SOULS, by J. H. Jowett, 128 pages, 50 cents net.

The strong spiritual element which marks all Dr. Jowett's other books is prominent in this one. The book treats "The Disciple's Theme," which is soul-winning; "The Disciple's Sacrifice," which is in behalf of soul-winning; "The Disciple's Tenderness," which should be characteristic of his manner in soul-winning, and "The Disciple Watching for Souls," which ought to be his attitude and employment. The Scriptures upon which he bases his discussions are such as these: "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, was this grace given, to preach unto the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ;" and, "I fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ." Nowhere else in the Book could better passages be found to set forth the fact that the Christian should have a passion for souls. That preacher has missed his calling who can read this little book without the embers of soul-winning being fanned into a flame.

REGIMENTAL REUNIONS AND FORTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY BATTLE CHICKAMAUGA,

CHATTANOOGA, SEPTEMBER 18-20, 1906.

On September 18, 1906, will occur the forty-third anniversary of the Battle of Chickamauga. It is proposed to celebrate this memorable event with a reunion of the various regiments that participated in this memorable battle and the various battles fought around Chattanooga. This reunion will be held at Chickamauga National Park, September 18, 19 and 20, and the present indications are that it will be the largest and most notable gathering ever held in the South. On the above dates, the remnants from the armies of twelve states, comprising the following: Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Kentucky, will assemble, many for the first and last time since they marched from its blood-stained fields, forty-three years ago.

Here is one of the great opportunities for the education of the youth. Don't fail to take your children and show them historic Chattanooga, with all its historical connections. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Go and see the old war generals and other officers; point out the places of interest on the battlefield; let them show you and explain, in person, the markers erected on the battlefield showing the positions of the opposing armies at the time of battle. It will not be long until none will be left to do this noble work.

It will be many years, if ever again, that such an opportunity will present itself. See that your tickets read via the Louisville & Nashville R. R., the Battlefield Route. Call on your nearest railroad agent for rates and advertising matter pertaining to the reunion, or write nearest representative of the Louisville & Nashville R. R.

MARSH.

Joseph M. Marsh was born near Keytesville, Mo., Jan. 7, 1835, and died suddenly of heart failure at his home in Triplett, Mo., June 19, 1906, aged 71 years, 6 months and 12 days. He was married to Miss Margaret Hampton, of Chariton county, June 5, 1859. The union was blessed with four children, three of whom, one son and two daughters survive, with their invalid mother and a large community of relatives and friends, to mourn an irreparable loss.

Judge Marsh, as he was widely and familiarly known in central and northern Missouri, was a man of unusual attainments. Physically, morally, intellectually and spiritually, his was "A combination and a form indeed,

Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man."

Passing through the dark days of the civil war as an officer in the Confederate army, he emerged a staunch believer in the cause of the Federal government, to which subsequently he gave his most loyal support. For many years he was cashier of the Farmer's Bank of Triplett, an honored and useful Elder in the church, a Mason of high rank, a prominent Odd Fellow, and a leading citizen of Chariton county, which distinctions he bore to the day of his demise. He read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST from its founding as "The Pioneer" without missing a copy, and his devotion to the great cause which it pleads was the ruling passion of his life.

Extensive reading and wide experience, through an active life of more than fifty years, gave him a knowledge almost encyclopaedic. There was scarce a subject you could bring before him, that you had not cause to wonder at the richness and fullness of the information he had somehow gathered, and so reliable was this that it was almost perilous to encounter him in controversy. Yet there lay his power, for he was broad, cheerful, magnanimous, employing his talents as a sacred trust for the benefit of others, who, knowing his sterling integrity, trusted him implicitly, and profited by that which most men would have used as an increased facility for promoting their own selfish ambitions and gain. It was this that made Judge Marsh the influential man that he was, first in his home, then in the church, then everywhere and in all things where duty seemed to call, and where opportunity could be clothed with the dignity and privilege of genuine Christian citizenship.

The writer conducted the funeral service in the presence of the largest concourse of people he has ever seen on such an occasion, and the remains were tenderly laid to rest mourned by the whole community. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them. C. P. SMITH.

The Aftermath.

His children talked apart from her, nor learned
To care for her as they had loved another;
Though much she tried to draw anear, and yearned
To be to them in very truth a mother.

And he, with saddened face and hair grown gray,
Saw that she came and went without repining,
Though oft he dreamed of her who went away
While still the radiant suns of spring were shining.

So passed the years; and if she ever thought
Of her who went before, the rich field robbing,
None ever knew the lonely fight she fought,
Nor ever heard her in the long nights sobbing.

The Bronze Vase.

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

PART III.

CHAPTER VII.

Wizzen cooked breakfast over a fire built upon the flat, sandy waste. He was rich in kindling and other inflammable wood, thanks to the generosity of the river. In recent floods it had brought all kinds of refuse. It had even carried heavy articles of iron and brass, and had battered them out of shape in its terrible but brief power. From a distance Kansas City was to be seen clinging to its rugged cliffs and peeping over high embankments at the swift river. The steamboat ferry passed and repassed the line of vision, and many skiffs and rafts floated under the bridges. Closer at hand were the huge piers of a bridge that had hoped to be great in the world, but had never gotten itself finished, and now looked as if it might be flat on its back with only its white legs sticking up in the air.

When the meal was ready, Wizzen unstrapped the upper table from his mover's wagon and set it in the shade of the wagon, for already the sun was hot on the desert. Mrs. Weed came from the clammy, earthy-smelling passenger coach, and a box was brought for her to sit upon. The rest stood up. Wizzen had fried bacon on an iron prong, and the young people had never before tasted bacon so good. On the table were various ready-made dishes, and when Mrs. Weed called for anything, they waited for her to point, for she always named something she didn't want. Raymund watched to see if she would ever call anything by its proper name, but she never did. Sometimes she could not call what she wanted by even a wrong name, because no name at all would come to her, and then she would wear a surprised look as if she thought something amiss with the English language, and would merely say, "Please hand me—" and nod her head in a certain direction. All this was a source of great admiration to Wizzen. "Surprising how the old lady can eat," he would murmur, "which she sometimes can do better than me!"

During the heat of that day, Rhoda remained with the old lady inside the coach, and Raymund and Wizzen gasped for air in the shade of the wagon, and sat in the car by turns. The air rang with the shouts of bare-legged children at play about the stranded houseboats —children in miserable rags and squalid filth who made nothing of the blazing heat, and who dodged the blows of their drunken parents, and set out upon begging expeditions to the city, as happy as kings and with far less responsibility. In the evening the covered wagon set forth upon its journey to St. Louis, and Raymund sat beside Wizzen on the front seat, while the canvas was tucked up all about, to admit the air.

"And how long do you think it will take, Wizzen?" asked Raymund when the city was lost from sight and the cool perfume of country fields was wafted to them on twilight breezes.

"It always depends on the hosses," said Wizzen.

"How long does it take your horses, Wizzen?"

"That depends," said Wizzen. He said it as if he considered the subject disposed of, so the other asked no more. Rhoda and old Mrs. Weed sat on the spring seat with their feet in the straw and their backs resting against pillows. Rhoda noticed that at each heavy jar the old lady swayed toward the end of the bench with some danger of falling upon the stove, so at last she put her arm about her companion and nestled close to her. Mrs. Weed was greatly startled, and trembled as with a chill. Rhoda, afraid her protection was undesired, started to draw away, but the old lady, divining her intention, caught her hand and held her arm in its place. It was now so dark in the wagon that they could not see each other's faces, but Rhoda knew that it was a tear that fell upon her hand. Was Mrs. Weed thinking about her daughter who had married Wizzen and then had deserted both husband and mother? Had there once been a time when that daughter, now wandering somewhere in a world of vice, had been a pure affectionate girl like Rhoda, ready to offer her embrace in protecting care? On the front seat, Raymund grew drowsy. He found himself nodding beside the driver, while Wizzen, secure in the darkness, chewed his tobacco safe from any eyes but the winking stars. When the wagon stopped, it was about 10 o'clock. The horses were hastily unhitched. The spring wagon seat was taken out that there might be room for Rhoda and Mrs. Weed to undress and go to bed. Wizzen and Raymund rolled up in comforts and slept under the wagon. May be the earth made a hard bed; the youth did not know. He had not slept much the night before in the Union Station and now he made up for it. When he awoke, the sun was sending long inquiring beams right under the wagon. They had passed the night at the hedgeside. There was the double-noted cry of the meadow lark from every side, and the air, cool with fragrant dew, made one want to nestle into the very heart of the comfort. But no; one must get up! Not far away was a pond, and thence water was brought for the toilette, after which the bucket was carried to a farmhouse beyond the pond, for drinking water. Wizzen had brought some driftwood from the river—not much for fear of tiring the horses. A fire was built and coffee was boiled. "This is great!" cried Wizzen as he sat at the roots of the hedge, a huge tin can of coffee in one hand, and a hunk of baker's bread in the other. "Boys, they's nothing like just keeping a-moving!" It was evident that he included Mrs. Weed under his generic term of "boys," for he added, "and nothing ain't more satisfying to me than to know how the old lady delights in it!" He nodded toward Mrs. Weed, to let her know he was talking about her, and the old lady smiling cheerfully, asked him if his tea was too hot. After breakfast the journey was resumed. "By rights," Wizzen told Raymund, "we ought to rest in the heat of the day, and travel early and late. But you can't have no set rules with my hosses. You've got to take 'em when they kin go, and not strain them too hard." Which gave prospects of a very long "overland voyage," for the animals had the look of being easily strained. That night Rhoda was much astonished when Mrs. Weed whispered to her in the privacy of the wagon, "Oh, if we could only get some place and stay there!" Rhoda would have returned that she thought Mrs. Weed liked moving about, but the ear-trumpet was lost, as usual, and even if it had been at hand, the girl would not have cared to shout so long a sentence. Perhaps Mrs. Weed suspected her thought for she added in a low voice, "It has been my dream ever since my marriage, to settle down some place and have a little home of my own. Just to know my own pump and go to it every day—and my own dear henhouse, and darling of a garden, and know it was mine, and I was fixed to it!" She sighed plaintively. "But Wizzen loves to go from one place to another. He's as much at home in this wagon as if the wheels were stone foundations. He doesn't care for earth at all, or chickens, or cats. It would never do for him to know how I pine to stop somewhere and stay there. He is so good to me—better than many an own son, much better—and he thinks I like travelling around, like a letter. I do not, Rhoda, but this is a deep secret. I know I can trust you."

Rhoda squeezed her hand assuringly and Mrs. Weed said, "You are so good to me, I wanted you to know my little secret. I am so glad to open my heart to you. Wizzen tells me you are an orphan and have no home of your own, and I know just how you feel. I feel the same way. I don't care how humble a spot you may pick out, or if the hut on it is cold in summer and damp in winter, just so it is home—just so you can stay there and feel that nobody can get tired of you there—nobody can wonder how long you are going to stay; because you are at home. And you love the look of the bare ground or weeds or grass, as the case may be, for it is your bare ground, or weeds or what not. You say 'The world is wide and crowded with millions of people who do not know me, and who wouldn't care for me if they did; but this spot knows me and cares for me—these chickens come when I beat the tin pan—this cat expects its milk from my hands—these birds are in my trees, like enough waiting to rob me of my berries or peck my tomatoes—ah, dear, sometimes my words may be mixed up, though perhaps you haven't noticed it; but when I get to talking about home, everything comes to my tongue that it needs."

There was a pause, then Mrs. Weed said, "But don't think I complain. Wizzen loves changing about, and we must pretend to like it too or he will be unhappy." Day after day, the wagon traveled eastward, till Booneville was reached. "Now, we'll go some out of the way," Wizzen announced, "but you won't keer for that as it will make the voyage last all the longer." The truth is that Rhoda had begun to find a striking monotony in the journey, but she imitated Mrs. Weed's prudence. Instead of crossing the river, they kept along the northern shore, passing various towns and villages. At last they reached Cole county and came to Jefferson City. "We'll not cross the river here," said Wizzen, "and so not have to cross her at all, thanks to our coming this far out of our way." Raymund had often wished that they might have come to some town with a cheap book store, and now his desire was gratified. He would be able, no doubt, to get the school books he needed, at a price somewhat in proportion to his needs. He still had over $60, and while there was that much wealth at his disposal, his mind ought not to suffer for lack of proper food. When they drove into Jefferson City it was raining hard, and everything looked as dismal as possible, and that is saying a good deal when you remember that we are speaking of the state capital. The wagon was driven upon a vacant lot, of which there were a plenty, and when the horses had been tied to the wheel—a needless ceremony—Wizzen informed the party that he had business in the city. Raymund, protected by his green umbrella set forth with him, but Wizzen presently contrived to give him the slip; perhaps he was not interested in books. When Raymund at last saw in the distance a book store, he hastened thither with a wildly beating heart, for books excited him as much as spring bonnets or fast horses do some others. Just as he reached the door his foot slipped, for the pavement was streaming with the downpour, and in recovering his balance he was hurled into the bosom of a man advancing from the other direction—a short, very fleshy man past fifty, with a bald head and a heavy white mustache, as if all the hair of his head had been washed downhill by the rain.

"What do you mean, sir?" cried the man staggering back and almost falling. He was very angry and glared at Raymund crying, "Why don't you look where you are going, sir?" Then his eyes grew wider and his face redder, and his breath more labored, as he cried, "What! if it isn't the young fellow with the green umbrella! Do you know, sir, that my leg was black and blue from the jabbing you gave it in Kansas City? Have you followed me all the way to the capitol to destroy me with that vile weapon?"

Raymund now recognized the passenger who had denounced him so fiercely on his first arrival at the Union Station. "I beg your pardon," he said earnestly. "I am very sorry indeed. And— and I can't help saying that I'm glad to see you again, for it's like meeting an old acquaintance!" And he bestowed his winning smile upon the storm-tossed fat man.

"Oh, you are, hey?" growled the other looking at him from under his shaggy eyebrows. "I make no doubt you are glad! What are you doing here? Did you follow me up?"

"I am looking for some cheap school books," said Raymund, still smiling, for the other, in spite of his angry voice, did not look at all dangerous.

"Then come in here," the fat man snapped. "I expect I can be of service to you."

"Boy Wanted."

People laughed when they saw the sign again. It seemed to be always in Mr. Peter's window. For a day or two—sometimes only for an hour or two—it would be missing, and passers-by would wonder whether Mr. Peters had at last found a boy to suit him; but sooner or later it was sure to appear again.

"What sort of a boy does he want, anyway?" one and another would ask; and then they yould say to one another that they supposed he was looking for a perfect boy, and, in their opinion, he would look a great while before he found one. Not that there were not plenty of boys— as many as a dozen used sometimes to appear in the course of a morning, trying for the situation. Mr. Peters was said to be rich and queer, and for one or both of these reasons, boys were anxious to try to suit him.

"All he wants is for a fellow to run on errands; it must be easy work and sure pay"—this was the way they talked to one another; but Mr. Peters wanted something more than a boy to run errands. John Simmons found it out, and this is the way he did it. He had been engaged that very morning, and had been kept busy all the forenoon at pleasant enough work; and although he was a lazy fellow, he rather enjoyed the place.

It was toward the middle of the afternoon that he was sent up to the attic, a dark, dingy place, inhabited by mice and cobwebs.

"You will find a long, deep box there," said Mr. Peters, "which I want you to have put in order. It stands right in the middle of the room—you can't miss it."

John looked doleful. "A long, deep box! I should think it was!" he said to himself as the attic door closed after him. It will weigh a ton, I guess; and, what is there in it? Nothing in the world but old nails, and screws, and pieces of iron, and broken keys, and things—rubbish, the whole of it. Nothing worth touching. And it is as dark as a pocket up here, and cold besides. How the wind blows in through those knotholes! There's a mouse! If there is anything I hate, it's mice! I'll tell you what it is, if old Peters thinks I'm going to stay up here and tumble over his old rusty nails, he's much mistaken. I wasn't hired for that kind of work."

Whereupon John bounced down the attic stairs three at a time, and was found lounging in the show-window an hour afterwards when Mr. Peters appeared.

"Have you put the box in order already?" was the gentleman's question.

"I didn't find anything to put in order; there was nothing in it but old nails and things."

"Exactly. It was the nails and things that I wanted put in order. Did you do it?"

"No, sir, it was dark up there and cold; and I didn't see anything worth doing. Besides, I thought I was hired to run errands."

"Oh," said Mr. Peters, "I thought you were hired to do as you were told."

But he smiled pleasantly enough and at once gave John an errand to go down town; and the boy went off chuckling, declaring to himself that he knew how to manage the old man; all it needed was a little standing up for his rights.

Precisely at six o'clock John was called and paid the sum promised him for a day's work; and then, to his dismay, was told that his services would not be needed any more. He asked no questions. Indeed, he had time for none, as Mr. Peters immediately closed the door.

The next morning the old sign, "Boy Wanted," appeared in its usual place.

But before noon it was taken down and Charles Jones was the fortunate boy. Errands—plenty of them! He was kept busy until within an hour of closing. Then, behold!—he was sent up to the attic to put the long box in order. He was not afraid of a mouse nor of the cold but he grumbled much over the box. Nothing in it worthy his attention. However, he tumbled over the things, grumbling all the time, picked out a few straight nails, a key or two, and finally appeared with this message:

"Here's all there is worth keeping in that box. The rest of the nails are rusty, and the hooks are bent, or something."

"Very well," said Mr. Peters, and he sent him to the postoffice.

What do you think! By the close of the next day Charlie had been paid and discharged, and the old sign hung in the window.

"I've no kind of a notion why I was discharged," grumbled Charlie to his mother. "He said that wouldn't suit. It's my opinion that he doesn't want a boy at all, and takes that way to cheat. Mean old fellow!"

It was Crawford Mills who was hired next. He knew neither of the other boys, and so did his errands in blissful ignorance of the long box until the second morning of his stay, when in a leisure hour he was sent to put it in order. The morning passed, dinner time came, and still Crawford had not appeared from the attic. At last Mr. Peters called him, "Got through?"

"No, sir, there is ever so much more to do."

"All right. It is dinner time now. You may go back to it after dinner."

After dinner he went back. All the short afternoon he was not heard from, but just as Mr. Peters was deciding to call him again he appeared.

"I've done my best, sir," he said, "and down at the very bottom of the box I found this."

"This" was a five-dollar gold piece.

"That's a queer place for gold," said Mr. Peters. "It's good you found it. Well, sir, I suppose you will be on hand to-morrow morning?"

This he said as he was putting the gold piece in his pocketbook.

After Crawford had said good-night and gone, Mr. Peters took the lantern and went slowly up the attic stairs. There was the long, deep box in which the rubbish of twenty-five years had gathered. Crawford had evidently been to the bottom. He had fitted shingles to make compartments, and in these different rooms he had placed the articles with bits of shingle laid on top, and labeled thus: "Good Screws." "Picture Nails." "Small Keys, Somewhat Bent." "Picture Hooks." "Pieces of Iron whose use I don't know." And so on through the long box. In perfect order it was at least, and very little that really could be called useful could be found within it.

But Mr. Peters, as he bent over and read the labels, laughed gleefully, and murmured to the mice: "If we are not both mistaken, I have found a boy; and he has found a fortune."

Sure enough, the sign disappeared from the window, and was seen no more.

Crawford became the well-known errand boy of the firm of Peters & Co. He had a little room neatly fitted up next to the attic, where he spent the evenings, and at the foot of the bed hangs a motto which Mr. Peters gave him. "It tells your fortune for you, don't forget it," he said, when he handed it to Crawford; and the boy laughed and read it curiously: "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful in much." I'll try to be, sir;" and he never once thought of the long box over which he had been "faithful."

All this happened years ago. Crawford Mills is errand boy no more, but the firm is Peters, Mills & Co.—a young man and a rich man.

"He found his fortune in the long box of rubbish," Mr. Peters said once, laughing. "Never was a five-dollar gold piece so successful in business as that one of his has been; it is good he found it."

Then, after a moment of silence, he said, gravely: "No, he didn't; he found it in his mother's Bible; 'He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much.' It is true; Mills the boy was 'faithful,' and Mills the man we trust."—Exchange.

Who Is She?

I know the dearest little girl,
  About as big as you.
Her eyes are black or brown or gray,
  Or maybe they are blue;
But, anyway, her hands are clean;
  Her teeth are white as snow;
Her little dress is always neat;
  She goes to school, you know.
This little girl—I love her well,
  And see her often, too—
If I to-day her name should tell—
  She—might—be—you. —Little Folks.

How Is It With You?

Bessie had been told about Jesus when she was a tiny girl, and she can not remember a time when she did not love him. Her teacher once asked her: "Bessie, have you found the Saviour yet?" "Why, I have never lost him," was the sweet reply. Can you say you have never lost the Saviour, but have always felt that he was with you?—Ex.

"You're a Brick."

When Tom says admiringly to Harry, "You're a brick!"—I wonder if he knows how the saying originated.

In the golden days of Greece, an ambassador once came from Epirus to Sparta, and was shown by the king over his capital. He was surprised to find no walls around the city.

"Sire!" he exclaimed, "I have visited nearly all the towns in Greece, but I find no walls for their defense. Why is this?"

"Indeed!" the king replied, "you cannot have looked carefully. Come with me to-morrow and I will show you the walls of Sparta."

On the following morning the king led his guest out upon the plains where his army was drawing up in battle array, and pointing proudly to the valiant soldiers, he said:

"There you behold the walls of Sparta—every man a brick!"

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, St. Louis, Mo.

Alexander Campbell's "Popular Lectures and Addresses" sold until recently for $3. This summer we will sell the book and The Christian-Evangelist for that price.

In the name of helpless children we protest against imposing inferior literature upon them that helps drive them from our Bible schools as soon as they get old enough to have initiative, when the W. W. Dowling supplies can be bought at prices no higher.

People of refined sensibilities who object to drinking from a common communion cup are entitled to some consideration, even if the "ruling elder" says there is no danger of spreading tubercular or other diseases in that way. Our individual communion service lends a new charm to this beautiful part of the worship. Write us for illustrations and price list.

I have received the picture of Brother Garrison. It is an excellent likeness of a splendid man that after generations will say lived ahead of his time. But he has helped us of his own day onward.—Harry Bower, Albion, Ill.

Brother Bower sent more than is required, but we will send the picture for one new subscription and one renewal, accompanied by $3.

We have found a pen we can recommend. It is a self-filling fountain pen. Regular price $2.50. We have arranged to sell pen and Christian-Evangelist for $2.75. The manufacturers are Christian men. They are financially reliable. If through ordinary use it becomes unsatisfactory within ten years, it may be returned to the manufacturers and a new one will be given in exchange. A description of pen sent on application.

Dog days are here, but dull days have not come to us as yet. A gratifying feature of our rapidly increasing circulation is the great number of new subscriptions coming one and two at a time from congregations in all parts of the land. These scattered legions of friends becoming keenly interested in introducing this best of literature in more homes is our confidence for the future. The following clubs of new subscribers have come since last week: Alameda, Cal., 5, P. C. Macfarlane, minister; Payson, Ill., 4, Gilbert Ellis, pastor; Fredericktown, Mo., 17, R. O. Rogers, minister; San Angelo, Tex., 3, S. T. Shore, pastor; Rowlett, Texas, 3; Sachse, Texas, 10; Dayton, O., 20, I. J. Cahill, pastor; Moberly, Mo., 13, W. B. Taylor, minister; Atchison, Kan., 11, W. S. Hilton, pastor; Circleville, Kan., 3.

In my judgment, the coming hymnal for Christian churches has arrived in "Gloria in Excelsis." My people are not simply pleased, they are immensely gratified with its introduction. Beauty and dignity in its appearance—a scope of variety in its songs to most any demand in worship—with responsive readings on which the people lay hold with pleasure—the Wabash congregation believes it has the 'ne plus ultra' of hymnals.—E. F. Daugherty, Wabash, Ind.

In going to the Buffalo convention October 12-18 get to the Wabash as soon as possible. Start from everywhere so as to connect with The Christian-Evangelist Special, which leaves St. Louis Thursday noon, October 11. Come via St. Louis from Omaha, Des Moines and all points west, south and southwest. You will have your choice from Detroit by lake or through Canada without extra charge. We shall secure you the best of hotel service in Buffalo at the lowest rates and with congenial friends.

After carefully examining "Gloria in Excelsis," I am fully convinced that the editor-in-chief and his associates have splendidly succeeded in making this book just what they designed it to be—"a high-grade dignified hymnal for the use of the churches." Its arrangement is faultless. The choice selections of Scripture are so abundant, and so well adapted to the different phases of church service, that every possible demand seems to be supplied. The distinct and careful classification of hymns, with the thorough indexing of subjects, is a feature of great practical value. The hymns selected are the very best, including practically all the old standard hymns of real worth, and many of the excellent modern hymns that have become an essential part of our best hymnology. The mechanical feature of the book in every sense could not well be excelled.—P. H. Duncan, Latonia, Ky.

The other night a street evangelist was preaching what might be called an "excited" sermon on a corner a couple of blocks east of the union depot. In his audience was a small newsboy. The preacher waved his arms and shook his head. Suddenly he quieted down and asked:

"My friends, who is it that watches over us; saves us from harm; frowns on wickedness; wants us to be gentle, and wishes to see not brutality?"

"I know," came from the newsboy. "It's President Roosevelt."—Denver Post.

FORGIVENESS

By John Greenleaf Whittier

MY heart was heavy, for its trust had been Abused, its kindness answered with foul wrong;
So, turning gloomily from my fellow-men,
One summer Sabbath day, I strolled among
The green mounds of the village burial-place;
Where, pondering how all human love and hate
Find one sad level; and how, soon or late,
Wronged and wrong-doer, each with meekened face
And cold hands folded over a still heart,
Pass the green threshold of our common grave,
Whither all footsteps tend, and none depart.
Awed for myself, and pitying my race,
Our common sorrow, like a mighty wave,
Swept all my pride away, and trembling I forgave.

WHAT WE STAND FOR.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
  Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
  The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
  For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
  Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing,
  And the song of victory.

1809 CENTENNIAL PROPAGANDA CHURCHES OF CHRIST 1909

: : : GEO. L. SNIVELY : : :

Looking Toward Pittsburg.

It is not likely that even Brother Muckley could make a more eloquent appeal for an offering from every church for church extension than is contained in correspondence printed below. Thousands are looking hopefully to the directors of this fund for "help to a foothold." They have the truth and convictions and courage and knowledge to nobly do when doing at all is made possible. An offering by every church the first Lord's day in September will mean the establishment of a multitude of new, strong churches by 1909.

We gladly give coveted Centennial Propaganda page space to Sister Harrison's report of Mrs. Maud D. Ferris' queenly memorial to her mother. How pleasing such Christian chivalry must be to Him who did not forget his dear mother even amidst the cares of establishing his kingdom and the anguish of the cross. May we not hope that many other dear departed ones than our saintly Sister Davis may thus be memorialized by loved ones lingering here who feel their names ought to be perpetuated on earth as an inspiration to all good works.

We most heartily congratulate the president and secretary of this Centennial committee of our national C. W. B. M., Sisters Garrison, of St. Louis, and Harrison, of Louisville, and all their helpers over this splendid fruitage of their labors, which we hope is simply the first fruits of a greater harvest.

Memorial Gift to the Christian Woman's Centennial Offering.

A beautiful gift is beautiful at any season; but it is altogether lovely when it comes at an appropriate time, and the grace of fitness is added to the grace of giving. The memorial idea is the very heart of our centennial movement, for our plans for celebrating this birthday of our church are all memorials to the great principles to which we have borne witness for one hundred years, and to the fathers of our faith who first voiced them. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions is bearing its part in this anniversary by establishing and strengthening memorial missions at eleven points in seven different countries. How fitting a season then is this for making memorial gifts!

It has come into the heart of a loving daughter to do this gracious deed—Mrs. Maud D. Ferris of Detroit, Mich., has given $25,000 to our new missionary training school at Indianapolis, in memory of her mother, Mrs. Sarah A. Davis, and it will be called in her honor, "The Sarah A. Davis Memorial Training School."

This gift will be a beginning in many ways. It is the largest gift ever received by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and may be an inspiration to others to do great things for God. It gives assurance of starting the first missionary training school among the Disciples of Christ on a scale worthy of the enterprise. And it is the first memorial offering to our centennial fund. May others claim a like beautiful ministry in the name and for the sake of their dear dead!—Ida W. Harrison, Centennial Sec. C. W. B. M.

Good Reasons for the Church Extension Offering.

There are 107 reasons why the church extension offering should be taken similar to the three we are giving by printing some letters forwarded to us by our corresponding secretary. These churches are our neighbors because our neighbor is the one in need. If every congregation among us could be a Board of Church Extension for just one week and make answer to the appeals as does the board at Kansas City, saying "we cannot help you until the churches send the money," it may be stated truly that no church in our brotherhood would be classed as a noncontributor to the September offering. Our extension board needs $130,000 now to answer appeals that have come since last March.

Fair Oak, Ind., Aug. 11, 1906.

Dear Brother Muckley:—I don't know whether it will be worth while, but I am going to write you to see if there will be any chance to secure a loan. Our house is small but good and insured for $800, but we have a debt of $335 and pay 8 per cent interest and the party is crowding us. We are few in members and poor in purse, but striving to build up, having secured regular preaching for half time. We feel fearful of losing our property unless we can secure a loan from you. The cause has always had a strong fight with the denominations here from the first, but now our minister gets a good hearing and we are in the road to a permanent footing if we can only hold our house. Hoping we can secure help from the Extension Fund, I remain.—W. F. Wilson.

Plains, Mont., June 19, 1906.

Dear Brother Muckley:—I am here in a meeting which is certain to result in a permanent organization. Am the first of our preachers to ever visit the town. Population about 500, and only four miles from the Flathead Indian Reservation soon to be opened. Sure to be a good town. Our people here are progressive, loyal and thoroughly acquainted with our plan of work. Emigrated here from Missouri several years ago. A lot has been donated and we will likely build this summer. In that event, is it your opinion that we could get a loan of $600 or $700, or even less? I should like to have your idea in the matter so as to formulate plans before closing the meeting July 1st. Our lot is centrally located, and for trustees we expect to put in good responsible persons.—F. H. Groom.

Ocean Park, Cal., April 28, 1906.

Dear Brother Muckley:—A choice tract, 213 lots in the heart of a city, has just been put on the market, and the Christian church secures option on a choice corner 105x125 at $3,000. This is a concession of $800 by the owners. The next corner north of us is held at $100 a foot, and the one just opposite us at $80 a foot. You can see what I have accomplished for the church in this. We want to erect a building for present use worth $2,500 to $3,000, and enlarge it in about two years. After raising all we can locally we shall need a loan of about $1,500. Can your board grant it? This is a beach town of high class, 17 miles from heart of Los Angeles and only nine miles from city limits. It has grown from nothing to 10,000 population in five years. Our location is central, two blocks from postoffice. Three blocks from the ocean. We will commence building as soon as plans can be prepared. I am on the Southern California Board which endorses our work. Please let me hear from you soon and favorably.—Geo. Ringo.

Enclosed find payment of my subscription to THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to February, 1908. Where a man's money goes his heart surely is. My heart is surely with THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in the brave, truthful, gentle and sane spirit continuously in evidence.—G. D. Edwards, Honolulu, Hawaii.

I am sending you a few names to whom I wish you to send THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for a few issues, and I will do my best to secure their subscriptions. I feel free to tell them that, according to my judgment it is the best paper published in the brotherhood. I am much pleased with the catholic spirit of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and will do what I can to assist in promoting the interest of the cause so dear to all our hearts through its wider circulation.—T. L. Read.

I notice in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST that for two subscriptions and $3 you will give the picture of Bro. J. H. Garrison. Now, I want this picture and will prize it very much, for I dearly love Brother Garrison, though I have never met him. I would go farther to meet him and shake hands with him than any other man in the nation, even our Chief Executive. For 25 years I have so much enjoyed his writings as to form a great attachment for him. Send me 20 sample copies of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I would like to have the paper in every home of my brethren for its gracious ministry. —A. M. Noel.

Current Events

Indictment of Standard Oil.

It really seems that the courts mean business with the Standard Oil Company. The tidings as they come through the press seem almost too good to be true. We have been in the habit of taking it for granted that there is always a way for an evil-doer to escape punishment, provided he is a big enough evil-doer. We have never believed this theory very implicitly and we hope that the public's faith in it is in a fair way to be destroyed. A federal grand jury at Chicago, and another at Jamestown, N. Y., have indicted the Standard for illegally receiving railroad rebates. The New York jury has also indicted the Pennsylvania railroad, and the Vacuum Oil Company. The Chicago jury has not yet indicted any railroads, but it may be taken for granted that, if the Standard is guilty of receiving rebates, somebody must be guilty of giving them. The interesting fact about all this is that the action has been taken under the old law which has been on the statute books for many years. The occurrence strongly confirms the position of those who have been asserting that what we need is more enforcement rather than more law. The new railroad rate bill will go into effect the latter part of this month, and then perhaps, we shall have both more law and more enforcement, which will be better than an increased supply of either element alone.

A Fallen Angel.

Ex-Senator James K. Jones, of Arkansas, is now figuring as attorney for the Standard Oil Company, and is especially interested in helping to evade the regulations of the Department of the Interior and enable the Standard to get control of all the oil wells in the Indian Territory. It will be remembered—and the cynical will smile as they remember it—that Senator Jones was chairman of the Democratic national committee in 1896 and 1900, and led in two whirlwind campaigns whose chief strength was in their opposition to plutocracy. The senator has either suffered a change of heart or enjoyed a raise of salary.

Railroads and Coal.

One of the most striking results of the new railroad rate law will be the separation of the railroad business from the coal business. The law makes it compulsory for railroads to dispose of their holdings in coal mines and coal lands before January 1, 1908. It is a matter of common knowledge that the coal situation in the east has been completely controlled by certain railroads. As common carriers they have been compelled to serve both themselves (in the capacity of coal producers) and their competitors. The temptation to down the competitors by withholding cars and raising freight rates has been too great for them. There is scarcely any section of the country in which coal is found in large quantities where one will not find abandoned coal mines or mines which have been sold at sacrifice for this reason. The separation of railroad interests and coal-producing interests will not only give the independent operators a chance, but will give the public at least half a chance to get coal at a fair rate.

Mr. Bryan.

Mr. Bryan is undertaking an enterprise of most tremendous difficulty when he starts upon a two years' campaign for the presidential nomination. To be sure he has, perhaps, not deliberately launched himself upon any such campaign, but the thing has been done for him by his best friends and without his disapproval. One of two things is true: either he is confident that he can make a two years' race without losing his wind, or laying himself open to fatal criticism in the press; or else he feels that his party needs the kind of exhortation and agitation which he alone can give and is not notably anxious as to the results for his own personal career. While we do not doubt that Mr. Bryan shares with nearly all the rest of the male population of this country the desire to be president, we are inclined to think that the latter hypothesis is the correct one. He is too good a politician to enter on a two years' campaign if getting the nomination were the only end in view. Within such a period there is too much time to make mistakes, say foolish things and make enemies. If he proceeds in other cases as he has with Mr. Sullivan, of Illinois, the process of making enemies will go on apace, and yet, it seems that even in this episode he has gained more than he has lost. Mr. Sullivan refuses to resign from the national committee, refuses even to get mad at the attack upon himself, and proposes to make the Illinois convention, which he will probably dominate, declare in favor of Bryan.

A Criticism.

That reminds us that our very good friend Ashley J. Elliott, manager of the Illinois Car Service Association, criticises our recent suggestion that railroads ought to pay demurrage for failure to furnish cars if they require shippers to pay it for failure to load or unload them promptly. He says:

> "The incentives of the two parties are diametrically opposed to each other. It is always to the railroad's interest to furnish cars promptly, while it is not always to the shipper's interest to unload them promptly. Of the railroad's sins of omission, failure to furnish cars to the extent of their ability is not one."

It might, to be sure, be assumed that, if furnishing and hauling cars is the business of a corporation, it will be to its interest to furnish them as promptly as possible, just as it is to a grocer's interest to wait on his customers as promptly as possible. But the case is not quite so simple. As we have said, railroads are sometimes competitors with their patrons, as in the coal business. Sometimes they have alliances with one patron which make it advisable not to serve others in the same line, as in the oil business. Some of the independent coal operators who have been ruined because they could not get cars while their favored competitors have been well supplied are tolerably confident that the maxim that "it is always to a railroad's interest to furnish cars promptly," is subject to important exceptions. Apart from all such cases of deliberate and culpable discrimination, it should be realized that the growth of commerce in this country in the last ten years, has been so great that, even by vast purchases of rolling stock, the roads have been unable to keep pace with the demands, even in those cases where it is to their advantage to furnish cars promptly. We will further add that such admirable organizations as that over which Mr. Elliott presides with marked ability, have the purpose and the result of minimizing this difficulty so far as possible.

A New Principle of Law.

An Indiana justice of the peace has established a new principle of law, which is that self defense is a legal excuse for theft as well as for murder. The evidence against the accused was complete and overwhelming, but his attorney showed that he was out of work, had done everything possible to get work and therefore had no way of supporting his family except by stealing. The justice upheld the validity of this plea, discharged the prisoner, and, as an evidence of good faith, gave him $5. He must have felt that stealing in self defense was at least undesirable, even if not illegal, or he would not have used his own good money to avert the recurrence of the necessity. The question has often been debated as to whether a starving man is justified in stealing a loaf of bread. Most people know that under those circumstances they would take the bread, and therefore they are slow to condemn a person who actually does so. But that is not the same as saying that it is a legal act. Sometimes in an emergency an illegal act is justifiable. In such a case it is better to admit the illegality, plead extenuating circumstances and ask for mercy, than to throw the law itself into disorder as the above mentioned justice has done, to the best of his ability. If a trivial matter is to be argued seriously for a moment, we should say that one defect in this theft-in-self-defense argument, is that it involves a careful and critical examination of the entire life of the defendant to determine whether his dire need is the result of his own indiscretion, or of unavoidable circumstances. The fact that he is sick or temporarily out of work proves nothing. Perhaps it is his own fault that he is sick; perhaps he would not have been out of work if he had learned a trade when he had opportunity. Perhaps being sick or out of work, he would not have been destitute if he had lived more frugally in the days of plenty. To lay upon the court the burden of determining all these facts, would be absurd. To admit the plea of self defense without the determination of them would be to turn loose upon society all the improvident, incompetent and unindustrious to prey upon it. There is no question that the Indiana justice has his heart in the right place, but it may be that he is a blood relative of that other celebrated justice of the peace who was nicknamed Necessity, because he knew no law.

Where Jesus Placed the Emphasis.

The cry "Back to Christ" has become a very popular one and there are but few theological back numbers left who would not agree that all our theologies and religious teachings should be tested by the mind of Christ. It is one thing, however, to accept a popular slogan, and another thing to be true to all that is involved in it. It is one thing to repeat the cry, "Back to Christ," and a very different thing to be willing to apply Christ's teaching to the problems of our own time. It is scarcely too much to say that the supreme need of the present time is that the church should adopt Christ's point of view, so far as possible, put into practical use his teaching, and emphasize those truths and duties which he emphasized. In a few articles we propose to call attention to some of the important things which Jesus emphasized in his life and teaching, hoping this may serve, in some measure, as a corrective of any wrong tendencies either in teaching or practice, but especially to incite to a forward movement along sane and safe lines of spiritual development.

I. The nature of God. It was doubtless one of the supreme aims of Jesus to reveal to men the true nature of God. This is fundamental in all true religion. Many false ideas had cursed the world for ages, and other ideas there were which were inadequate and unsatisfactory. What the world needed was a true knowledge of God. "And this is life eternal that they should know the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ" (John 17:3). The great and characteristic teaching of Jesus concerning God is his fatherhood. Concerning this fundamental truth Jesus himself said, "Neither doth any know the Father, save the Son and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him" (Matt. 11:27). He also said to Philip who had asked him to "show us the Father": "Have I been so long time with you and dost thou not know me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; how saith thou, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" (John 14:9,10). To Thomas he had just said: "No one cometh unto the Father but by me" (John 14:6). He taught his disciples when they prayed to say, "Our Father who art in heaven" (Matt. 6:9).

This is at once the most informing and comforting view of God which has ever been revealed to men. We have only yet begun to understand what is involved in this sublime truth. The religious world has been slow to grasp its significance. It has already destroyed many erroneous doctrines concerning the atonement, the method of God's government, the spirit of our worship, and future rewards and punishments. We can not here enter into the matter of how far and in what direction the fatherhood of God has modified, and in some cases destroyed once popular doctrines on this subject. It must suffice here to say that no doctrine can long survive that antagonizes, or is inconsistent with, the idea that God is our Father. Take a single illustration: The once popular theory that God sent his Son into the world to die for the elect few whom he had foreordained to be saved, while passing by all others because they had been foreordained to eternal damnation—how utterly inconsistent this doctrine is with the fatherhood of God! Would an earthly father treat his children thus? If we being evil know how to treat our children impartially, how much more will our heavenly Father be equally kind and merciful to all his children?

It is a strange fact that men often charge God with doing what would be a crime in an earthly father. No just and kind-hearted earthly parent would think of punishing a child for mistaking the meaning of a command, and honestly and lovingly doing what he thought was his father's will; and yet many Christians hold it to be very unsound and unsafe doctrine to teach that God is as good and just as an earthly father in this respect! If we would only be loyal to the instincts of our own heart, we would in many respects be better theologians than when we seek to construct our theology on purely logical and intellectual grounds.

The truth of God's fatherhood has implications in the direction of sociology which the church is only beginning to apprehend. Even yet the great mass of Christians are indifferent to the claims which the outcasts and the neglected portions of society have upon them. If God is the Father of all men in a very true and real sense, having created them and endowed them with a moral nature and a will like his own, does he not care for the sufferings and the mental, moral and physical poverty of these great wretched masses of humanity which are without God and without hope in the world?

Does not his heart go out in loving and fatherly sympathy toward all these prodigal sons and daughters of his who are in the far country? How then can the church be indifferent to what is a matter of deep concern to the heart of God? One would think, judging from the vast tomes of theology which have been written, and the comparatively small attention that has been given to the subject of how to alleviate human suffering and sorrow and carry light and life to the "submerged tenth," that God was more concerned about our having correct philosophical and theological conceptions of the Trinity, than about how we treated our brother man. But John thoroughly represents the mind of Jesus in saying, "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, can not love God whom he hath not seen" (1 John 4:20). The church that is not concerning itself with the work of caring for the poor, the infirm, and even the criminal and outcast classes of society, has a new lesson to learn from the teaching of Jesus concerning the fatherhood of God.

This truth, too, has an important bearing in our evangelistic work which, hitherto, has been too largely confined to respectable and well-to-do classes of people. We have yet to carry our evangelism into the slums and seek to save drunkards, thieves and libertines, the victims of lust and of evil habits. And yet Jesus said he "came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance," meaning, thereby, the very outcasts of society. If there be more joy in heaven over one of these prodigal souls recovered from sin and Satan, than over ninety and nine respectable, moral people, it would seem that we ought to make more effort to bring this class of people to repentance. This is surely one of the implications of the truth of God's fatherhood.

An Estimate of the Manchester Meeting.

In response to a letter from the Editor asking Brother Crerie of Haverhill, Mass., his impression of the Manchester meeting, after referring to some of the opposition and misconceptions which had to be overcome, Prother Crerie says:

> But this misrepresentation, opposition, etc., was met with and overcome. The people soon learned that a "Holy Roller" or "Holy Jumper" was not preaching to them, but one with the open Bible, rightly dividing the Word. Naturally, they regarded the teaching at first with suspicion. It was altogether new. The appeal to their intelligence was one which they could not at once appreciate. However, the plea was attractive and audiences increased. Men and women brought their Bibles. It was evident that the Book was being searched as never before. Questions were asked and were promptly answered. Confidence in the evangelist was manifest, and the truth was admitted by many who acknowledged that never before had they understood God's word in its true light. This was not done with smiling faces, but with tears in their eyes. How could they help it? Were they not being torn away from the faith of their mothers and fathers, the faith of their childhood? All that was dear to them seemed to be vanishing away, but nevertheless they saw the way to the Father's home more perfectly and were constrained to admit it.
> When the meeting closed there were quite a number who said they would stand by a work if we established one there. Therefore, it is necessary that the work continue until Brother Yeuell returns for a big campaign. The prospects look encouraging to me; yet, I am aware that it means hard work and undaunted faith and hope in New England to accomplish a respectable organization in Manchester. It can be done and it will be done.
> The building of the Christian church (connection) has not been secured as yet; however, if we cannot get it we may be able to secure the city hall, which is not too large, for a very reasonable amount of money. By preaching twice a month and visiting those who are interested and distributing some of our tracts I believe that a solid foundation can be laid for a great meeting, which will result in a fine church.
> This work should be started without delay as there are opportunities now which later will be harder to realize. It will be wise to strike while the iron is hot.

We quite agree with Brother Crerie as to the wisdom of "striking while the iron is hot." This splendid meeting should be followed up, as soon as possible, by another which shall carry on to completion the work which has been so well begun. If the contributions from the brethren for this work shall indicate their approval, no doubt it will be promptly and vigorously followed up.

Notes and Comments.

Under this caption we are requested to assume the role of school master this week. We comply, hoping to receive and throw at least a little light on these problems grown familiar perhaps to our older readers, but of interest to those waves of younger Disciples ever riding into positions of responsibility in the churches.

Where is the authority for a woman to preach? —M. D. Burner.

See Galatians 3:28; Acts 21:9; Philippians 4:3. This liberty, however, should not be exercised whenever it would come in conflict with any other teaching of the Word of God.

1. Was the apostle Paul eligible to the office of bishop or elder?

2. Is a single man possessing all the other qualifications eligible to the office of deacon?

3. If a man who has used the office of elder almost continually for forty years, possessing all the qualifications, should unfortunately lose his wife by death, would the church for this reason be justified in demanding his resignation?

Enquirer.

1. He was a bishop, or elder, of the church, though more of the church at large than of any local congregation. He had "the care of all the churches."

2. We think so; though other things being equal a man with a wife would be preferable. It is not, as we understand, the absence of a wife but a plurality of wives that is a bar to the eldership.

3. Certainly not.

1. Give chapter and verse in Bible for the expression, "Church of Christ," singular number.

2. Is "Christian Church" when applied to one of our local churches any more sectarian than "Church of Christ?"

3. When the deed of one of our churches has read "Christian Church" for 25 years are we justified in having it changed to "Church of Christ?"

4. If it happens to be in Tennessee where "Church of Christ" stands for warfare on the organ, would one of our congregations do well to change from "Christian Church" to "Church of Christ" and thus be branded as exceedingly sectarian in pushing non-essentials to the point of tests of fellowship?

5. Is not "Church of God" (Acts 20:28) the actual Scriptural name for the local church?

6. Does not "Church of God'" include in its meaning a recognition of Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and thus give a fuller meaning to the real name of the church?

Boulder, Col. S. M. Bernard.

1. Christ's statement, "On this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:18), is sufficient authority, if there were no other, for the name "Church of Christ." The use of this name in the plural, however, for local congregations (Rom. 16:16) implies the correctness of its use for the church universal.

2. No. It is just as Scriptural in its meaning, we think, if not in its form, as "Church of Christ."

3. We think not. We can see no justification for such change.

4. We think not. We would not allow a monopoly of the name "Church of Christ" to those who would sectarianize it and make it equivalent to an "anti-organ" or "anti-missionary" church.

5. It is one "actual Scriptural name," but has no monopoly since other names are used.

6. We think not, since the name "Church of Christ" carries with it the teaching of Christ concerning the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

It will be an excellent indication of real progress among us when we cease to contend about which of these Scriptural names we shall be known by, and become far more concerned that our churches shall be worthy of any one of these names.

Current Religious Thought.

"The Baptist Argus," in the following editorial on "A New Baptist Literature," recognizes the necessity of a constructive literature based on the positive elements of Baptist faith that Baptists might have confidence in the sufficiency of the Baptist message, initiative, inspiration, doctrines, graces, culture and power to win this world for Christ.

Too great a proportion of our own literature is suggestive rather of the forum and tournament than of the temple. Our books should be illumined with love and positive teaching rather than with scintillations from Damascan blades. A demand for this literature will soon create it. We shall make better progress when going toward the gates of the city that lieth four square instead of up against our "religious adversaries."

Very much of the contents of the shelves in our Baptist libraries necessarily belong to limited periods in our history. Controversies, like those involved with the Hardshell and Disciple movements, threw off quite a number of books and tracts, which we have done wisely to preserve, but it is well for us to recognize the fact that such publications can hardly be called literature. Like the rings in a tree, they make record of what happened at the time, but they live not, and like the rings in the tree are covered up with new growth and left behind. Such publications are valuable in their way. With much zeal have we recently been studying the ring made in the seventeenth century, sending experts to the dusty vaults of Europe where lie buried the publications of that time.

But Baptists cannot content themselves with the kind of publications which are thrown off in times of controversy. Dr. J. B. Gambrell strikingly says that, "It is a mighty poor theology which is pitted up against some other theology." The truths of God are great enough to stand alone. Our weakness and ignorance need in quiet hours to feed upon the complete things of heaven. Our ultimate work is to join as co-workers with the Father and the Son in building a mighty kingdom on earth, in turning this world into heaven. Here and there and now and then we may have to tear down some structure in the way, cast out of the land some opposers of the King, but our great work is construction. Some few of us may need to be chosen as sheriffs and executioners, whom we should pray for and pity as well as honor. They are the less blessed in that they must make rings only in the growth of the kingdom which shall be covered up and forgotten. Blessed are the builders of the coming kingdom! Those who labor with the Father and the Son in lifting up the walls and the domes, making the structure so mighty and glorious that the enemies looking upon it can but fall away in confusion and rout.

There are books, Baptist books, which belong to the great stream of devotional and inspirational literature which has come surging to us from the beginning through the centuries; books which will go on blessing and impelling the race towards its goal. Thrice blessed is the man who produces such a book.

It would seem from the following extract from the "Jackson Examiner" of Independence, Mo., that the ministers there are preaching and practicing a little Christian unity or federation, as you may please to term it, and that the editor of the paper mentioned is quite pleased with it. Bro. L. J. Marshall is the pastor of the Christian church referred to:

The great audience, the music and the preacher at the Presbyterian church Sunday evening were a consummation and a prophecy. The builders of the great auditorium did not know when they laid the foundations nearly a score of years ago, that they were working for an era of reunited Christianity—when brethren would converge in the essentials of one faith and one destiny. The occasion was federation accomplished. The virile ministerial representatives of the Protestant churches of Independence deserve the benediction, "Well done, good and faithful servants." They have exalted their churches and obtained the essential unity of their memberships.

The religious community is to be congratulated upon the prevalence of unity in the deliverances of the pastors of the respective churches, notably, in the discourse of the pastor of the Christian church, Sunday evening. It was an able and practical application of the common faith and a strong exposition of the evils of Phariseeism. Though not specifically applied to the sectarian controversies of the past, it comprehended and relegated them to the ecclesiastical muck pile of the last century and presented the Christian faith unencumbered by scholastic excrescences.

Ours is not the only religious body that has self appointed conservators of the faith —as understood by the conservators only. "The Word and Way" (Baptist) feels that A. C. Dixon has tilted the ark by accepting the pastorate of Moody's church in Chicago and in an article entitled "A Conspicuous Denominational Lapse," thus steadies it:

The old Baptist flag, in the hands of A. C. Dixon, has been lowered. For many years this fine man of God has been regarded as a steadfast and stalwart Baptist—an able defender and promoter of the Baptist faith. Now he virtually deserts the Baptist ranks and surrenders the Baptist position. He goes to the pastorate of Moody's church, Chicago, an interdenominational church. He is quoted as saying, "I have no intention of ceasing to be a Baptist." There is no use mincing words. He has already ceased to be a Baptist. A Baptist would not and could not consent to become pastor of a nondescript and irresponsible church—a church without denominational conviction or connection. The Moody church is an independent organization holding the ordinances as things absolutely indifferent and inconsequential. It practices open communion and sprinkling. Can a Baptist approve such things? Never. And how can Dr. Dixon accept the pastorate of such a church without giving endorsement to the heresies for which it stands, and on which it is built? And how can he lend himself to the endorsement of the heresies without surrendering the Baptist position?

PENTWATER MUSINGS.

Summer has never seemed more queenly, nor has her reign been more mild and beneficent than during the present season in this latitude. The beautiful days and star-lit nights following each other in succession have been linked together by golden sunsets, making a chain of bright memories which will bind the hearts of many to the quiet woodland ways, winding ravines and commanding heights of "Garrison Park," at Pentwater. If at intervals the blue skies have been veiled with clouds, these clouds have been the chariots of God with which he waters the hills and vales and refreshes all living things. Michigan is rapidly becoming the greatest summer resort state in the Union. The shores of her inland lakes, as well as those of the great "unsalted sea" which bears her name, are dotted with summer cottages, some stately and beautiful, some humble and cozy, in which tens of thousands of people from the great cities of the south and middle west find refuge from the heat of summer. The east shore of Lake Michigan possesses, we believe, the finest summer climate in the United States. But only those favored spots along its shore line where an inland lake, connecting with the great lake, provides a channel and a harbor for the steamers, combine the advantages necessary for an ideal resort. Professor E. S. Ames, of the University of Chicago, recently visited the east shore of Lake Michigan, stopping off at the various resorts from Michigan City as far north as Pentwater, where we had the pleasure of a visit with him during one day. He came as a committee representing the Campbell Institute, made up of a large number of our young ministers, and some others that are older, to spy out a place where its membership could have fellowship together in a cool, healthful, quiet restful resort. On his return to Chicago he reported unanimously in favor of Pentwater. This is the class of people that Pentwater appeals to, and this is the kind she is drawing to her shores.

A few weeks ago the Editor had a letter from the Baptist minister at Spring Lake, near Grand Haven, Mich., Rev. Wm. A. Alleyn, asking us to stop off and preach for him in passing, if possible, expressing at the same time a special interest in the position of the Disciples. We invited him to Pentwater and proposed a union meeting between the Baptists and the Disciples in the Baptist church here, which was arranged for last Lord's day. At his request we preached in the morning on "Christian Union," to a good audience made up of representatives of different religious bodies. The sermon seems to have been heartily approved by all and particularly by our ministerial visitor. Brother Alleyn spoke at night on "Conditions of Discipleship," from the text, "If ye abide in my word then are ye truly my disciples; and ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." He was heard with interest and approval by both Baptists and Disciples of Christ. As the Baptists have no minister at present, and the Disciples no house nor settled pastor either, it would seem they might co-operate with profit in sustaining religious services until such time as they could see their way to unite more fully, or, if that is impracticable, to at least work together as far as possible for the religious welfare of the community, in which an aggressive type of Christianity is greatly lacking. There are many other communities in a similar condition where the Baptists and Disciples would be mutually benefited by getting closer together. The matter of organic union need not be pushed. That will take care of itself if the conditions are made favorable for the cultivation of brotherly love.

One of the most pleasant incidents of the season thus far was a picnic of a few friends up Lake Pentwater on Monday following the meeting mentioned above. The Stows of Grand Rapids, the Denholmes of New Orleans, the Garrisons and their guest, Brother Alleyn, made up the party. Brother Stow chartered one of those combination boats which have a double motor power of engine and sail, which afforded ample room for the party and the generous cargo of provisions which is necessary to a successful picnic. On a shady knoll fronting a bayou on the lake, about two miles up from Lake Michigan, we camped and spent a delightful afternoon in social fellowship and in such pastimes as young people enjoy, and everybody is young at a picnic. At 6 o'clock a bountiful repast was served and relished as only picnickers can relish such a meal. The day was ideal for such an occasion. Back in the country further it would have been called warm, but under the shade of the trees and fanned by the breeze which came up over the lake, it was delightful. At 6:30 our boat returned for us, coming as near the shore as the depth of water would permit, while the two row boats which we had towed up served to transport the passengers and baggage out to it. The ride back down the lake on that quiet evening, with the great red sun in front just sinking behind the sand dunes of Lake Michigan, the crimson and purple ripples of the lake behind us and the green hills on either side, made a charming picture which memory will long cherish. Such familiar hymns as "Shall we gather at the River?" "Homeward Bound" and "Throw out the Lifeline," sung by the party on the return trip, made us think of the old days at Macatawa and the friends with whom we were wont to gather there on similar occasions.

Last night all the resorters on Lake Michigan south of the channel, including those of Oceana Beach and "Garrison Park," were the guests of Judge Montgomery and wife at a corn-roast down on the beach. A great bonfire was built in the early twilight, and by the time night's candles were lighted in the heavens, the entire population of these resorts were gathered by the shore of the rippling lake and around the bonfire enjoying a very happy social. The corn and butter and salt were furnished by our hosts, and each one had the privilege of roasting his corn by holding it over the coals at the end of a long stick or by covering it up in the shuck in the hot embers. The corn thus cooked was delicious but not more so than the good fellowship which prevailed among all the people present. One other judge of the supreme court of Michigan was present besides our host, and we understand a third one is coming. There is no doubt but what we shall have good order at this resort! Among other things proposed was a suggestion by the Easy Chair for a Sunday evening vesper service on the beach, such as has been held for years at Macatawa Park. The idea met with enthusiastic approval and we shall probably hold the first service of the kind on August 26. Our suggestion that this corn-roast be made a perpetual annual institution was also heartily approved. A vote of thanks was given Judge and Mrs. Montgomery for their hospitality and the pleasure they had afforded the company, and after a number of songs the resorters quietly dispersed to their cottages. It will be seen by the foregoing incidents that we are not without enough of the social life here on this shore to prevent us from becoming barbarians!

From some letters which have reached us we infer that the recent paragraph in the Budget, referring to the Editor's health and the doctor's advice for him to stick to his "reservation" during the heated term, and not attend the conventions, has been interpreted more seriously than was intended by the office editor, pro tem, who, in the kindness of his heart, thought to protect us from being pressed into service in the torrid belt during the hay-fever season. One widely known brother writes expressing his deep regret that we are not to attend the national convention at Buffalo. We are glad to say that, although for a few weeks we have hardly been in our usual health, there is no cause whatever for serious apprehension on the part of our friends. We are able to keep up our regular work with some extra work thrown in, and it is our full purpose at present to attend the Buffalo convention. We are hoping that it will be one of the great milestones in our religious progress toward higher and better things. We are praying that the spirit of unity, of brotherly love, of humbleness of mind, and consecration of heart, may so pervade that convention that it shall become a real Mount of Vision from which we shall get a clearer view of the work to which God has called us and of the mighty possibilities within our reach. It will require much prayer, as well as wise planning, to make such a convention possible. But is not the object worth the effort?

As Seen From the Dome

By F. D. Power

It is a two thousand mile journey from Nice to Liverpool through the western Mediterranean, the Straits of Gibraltar, the Atlantic, Bay of Biscay and St. George's Channel. It was restful enough after our somewhat strenuous life in the east. On reaching England we learned of the frightful eruption of Vesuvius which I had ascended only four days before it wrought such ruin. We could not but regret we missed the startling scenes of April 7-14, though we were no doubt safer at sea. England received us coldly after dealing with the Syrian, Egyptian and Italian suns. The signs of spring were everywhere, but the change was most noticeable. Hedges were turning green and flowers blooming, and fruit trees in full blossom by the roadways. England's delightful rural scenery is approaching its ideal beauty. Our journey was first to Oxford, the seat of the great university. It is a city of 60,000, charmingly situated on the Thames, an hour and a half from London. It is the center of conservative England. When I purchased my first newspaper, the question was "what is your politics, Conservative or Liberal?" "Liberal," I answered. Oxford is a part of old England. It is beautiful and restful, and that was what I wanted. The Easter holiday was on which, strangely enough, lasts five weeks. So we had the colleges to ourselves. We pitched our tent near Carfax. "Carfax" is simply a place where four roads meet, a center, quadrifurcus, "four-forked." So our English friends work wonders in words, as the famous St. Mary Magdalen college here becomes "Mandlen." Turning to the right here I found myself at once in Christ Church college. At its entrance is the "Tom Tower;" so called because an 18,000-pound bell called "Great Tom" hangs here. Nothing seemed so sweet and musical in Oxford as its bells. Every night at 9.05 we would listen to Tom toll 101 strokes a curfew and signal for the closing of the college gates. The gates were erected by Cardinal Wolsey and the bell tower was added by Sir Christopher Wren. We passed through into the great quadrangle, 264x261 feet. All the twenty-six colleges which constitute the university are built this way. There may be several of these "quads" and they differ in size, but about them in one continuous pile are the dormitories, lecture rooms, and three most important structures, library, chapel and dining hall. Passing through this quadrangle we entered the chapel which is also the "Cathedral Church of Christ" of Oxford. This goes back to Saxon times to the religious house founded in 740 by St. Frideswide. The present church is 800 years old. It has curious old tombs, splendid windows, and fan-traceried roof with beautiful vistas. Wolsey founded Christ Church college and it has graduated such men as Mansfield and John Locke, Sir Robert Peel and Canning, Ben Johnson and Sir Philip Sydney, Gladstone, Salisbury and Rosebery, John and Charles Wesley, and others who have made England illustrious. Across from Christ church a little ways one enters Pembroke college, a plainer group of buildings. What most interested me here was the association with Dr. Johnson. The old fellow's rooms were just over the entrance way. The care-taker showed me his desks, his portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds, which is preserved most sacredly, his teapot and cup. He is credited with drinking twenty cups of his favorite beverage at the time; this cup holds at least a pint! Boswell should rise and explain. Along the same way I passed to the Folly bridge which crosses the Thames and I was on the "Isis," as this part of the river is classically known at Oxford. Here were the college barges and boat houses, and numberless craft from "Canaders" to eight-oars and here the great races are rowed. It is a charming spot with its meadows and waters. One notices strange old streets and signs "rows" and "yards" as he walks about Oxford. Here are old time taverns "The Dolphin and the Anchor," the "Three Cups," the "Lamb and the Flag," and the "Bull and the Mouth."

Turning to the left from Carfax along "Corn-market street," I came to a cross in the pavement marking the spot where Latimer and Ridley were burned, as every child once read about in Fox's "Book of Martyrs." Near the spot is a monument with statues of the three great ones, Latimer, Ridley and Cranmer, "who yielded their bodies to be burned bearing witness to the sacred truths which they had affirmed and maintained against the errors of the Church of Rome, and rejoicing that to them it was given not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his sake."

Balliol college is near the Martyrs' Memorial. This is Robert Browning's college and the "Old Yellow Book" which suggested the "Ring and the Book," is shown you, and some of his original manuscripts. The college was founded in 1260. John Wycliffe was fellow and master of Balliol, Adam Smith and Lockhart, Sir William Hamilton and Southey, Benjamin Jowett, Lord Milner and Lord Curzon were among its distinguished sons. I read this tribute to Nettleship, for thirty years tutor here: "He loved great things and thought little of himself. Desiring neither fame nor influence he won the devotion of men and was a power in their lives, and seeking no disciples he taught to many the greatness of the world and of man's mind."

All of the colleges are of great interest to the visitor, each having its special features. Trinity, with its gardens and famous "Lime walk," grass plots and ancient yews; Exeter, founded in 1314, with its magnificent chapel and wonderful piece of tapestry by Burne-Jones, "The Adoration of the Magi;" Lincoln, the plainest and cheapest of the great schools, where I looked into the little room of John Wesley about 8x7, and the small meeting place of "The Holy Club," where Methodism was born; All Souls, with its great Codrington library of 80,000 volumes, its memories of Jeremy Taylor, Christopher Wren, Bishop Heber and the poet Young, and Sir William Blackstone whom every lawyer is supposed to know and the announcement of whose lectures one sees framed and hung in the library—all have a great history. Perhaps the most beautiful of this great cluster of institutions is Magdalen. In All Souls I met one of the tutors who for thirty years has taught history. As illustrating the conservatism of Oxford he was a good one. I spoke of Mr. Gladstone, an honorary fellow of All Souls. "A very remarkable person," said the tutor. "Did a good many bad things. Miserable foreign policy. But a remarkable person!" In Magdalen I met a bright student who showed me around. "Magdalen," wrote Macaulay, "is one of the most remarkable of our academical institutions. Its graceful tower catches afar off the eye of the traveler who comes by road from London. As he approaches, he finds that this tower arises from an embattled pile, low and irregular, yet singularly venerable, which embowered in verdure, overhangs the sluggish waters of the Cherwell." It is indeed an ideal spot, on one side the botanic gardens, and on the other "The Water Walks of Magdalen." It dates from 1458. The buildings form four quadrangles covering twelve acres. Its "water walks" were specially loved by Addison and its grove has a large herd of deer quietly browsing under huge old elms, with cawing rooks as though the haunts of men were distant and forgotten. One observes curious old customs in these colleges. Here at "Mandlen" for example, in one corner of the old "quad" is a little canopied pulpit where a sermon is preached annually on John the Baptist day to a congregation assembled in the quadrangle, the ground being strewn with rushes and grass, and the buildings dressed with green boughs in commemoration of the preaching of John in the wilderness. Another custom is to sing on every May day morning at five o'clock on the summit of the tower a Latin hymn to the Trinity by the choir habited in their surplices. Still another quaint ceremonial is observed at Queen's college, where, on New Year's Day, the Bursar presents to each member or guest a needle and thread with the words, "Take this and be thrifty," derived, it is said, from a fanciful rebus on the name of the founder, Eglesfield—aignille et fil.

The Bodleian library is one of the great things of Oxford, called for Sir Thomas Bodley, the tercentenary of which was kept October 8, 1902. It has 700,000 volumes and vast literary treasures. I saw here Queen Elizabeth's exercise books when a child and a wonderful Shelley collection, and this letter written on papyrus by an Egyptian boy of the second century showing that boys are everywhere and in all ages boys: "Theon to his father Theon, Greeting: It was a fine thing of you not to take me with you to Alexandria. Send me a lyre, I implore you. If you don't I won't eat; I won't drink, there, now!" I saw here also the famous "Logia" fragment words of Jesus found by the Egyptian Exploration Fund.

The Clarendon Press is another wonder of Oxford. Here the famous Bibles are printed, 40,000 a year. There are 700 persons employed and 247 machines. I saw them printing Bibles in all tongues, and the process from the setting of type to the finishing of the complete Bible and their great Oxford "Dictionary on Historical Principles," nine parts of which are issued and only four letters published, though begun in 1882. They are past masters in the art of printing. It is still a question whether the first book published in England was issued from Oxford or from the Caxton's. In the infancy of the art preservative of arts a book appeared having the Colophon Oxonic 1468. They print here the "finger Testament" and "finger prayer-book" and "thumb prayer-book," the Brilliant Text Bible which is the smallest ever published, weighing three ounces, and the Folio Bible, which is the largest.

Who are now some of the great men of Oxford? Well, of the 400 and over of teachers instructing 4,000 students, are such men as Robinson Ellis in Latin and Bywater in Greek, Pelham in Roman History, Firth in Modern History, Bigg and Cheyne and Driver, Dicey and Sayce, and our man Osler. Oxford is a great place. "It is a despair to see such a place and ever to leave it; for it would take a lifetime and more than one, to comprehend and enjoy it satisfactorily," as Hawthorne said.

Modern Religious Persecution---A Defense

By B. L. Chase

6. Instructions to Persecutors.

I would always recommend that you use the regular weekly religious newspaper as your method of persecution. It is very much better than going in person to the supporters of a college or the members of a church. It is both sober and cheaper.

Calculate how much it would cost in time, car-fare and hotel bills to go in person, for instance, to California to visit every trustee and friend and supporter of Berkeley Bible Seminary, if there were some teacher in the school against whom you had collected proof of heresy. Then, too, it would look mean and disreputable for a venerable persecutor to go around the state from town to town, and from house to house, explaining and elaborating the charges of heresy to the various churches and contributors toward the seminary. It would be undignified. Even the printing of circulars containing the charges would be costly, and their circulation through the mails would be costly.

The very best, the neatest, cheapest, and most respectable plan, would be to go to the newspaper that had the widest circulation in the state and give your material to the editor. Be sure, of course, that he is in favor of persecution in general, or of this case in particular. He will print the charges, with all the evidence, direct and indirect, without any cost to you, and the mails will carry it at newspaper rates, to every Disciple in the state. It is easy and desirable in such a case to send sample copies of that issue to many persons in the state who do not take the paper. There is no extra expense, and some persons might be induced to subscribe for the paper when they see the profound interest which it takes in the religious and educational affairs of the state. You see how simply and how clearly it is all done by the newspaper method. You can speak in the newspaper exactly as you would in person, while few object to it.

Your difficulty, however, will be in persuading the management of the paper to surrender its columns and influence to your cause. You should make it appear how advantageous it would be to the cause of Christ, and how profitable to the newspaper. Not every newspaper among the Disciples can be swung around to such a proposition. They have silly scruples and false notions about the function of a religious journal, and those impossible ideals of a broad, sweet, and Christian-spirited journalism that they will tell you about. The facts in the case show that such papers do not prosper as others. They are not ready to sacrifice themselves for the purity of religious doctrine, and in defense of the "Old Jerusalem Gospel." The people like a good, clean fight against heresy, and they will put up for it.

As for the various words in the English language which you should use as instruments of persecution (since the law and public opinion limit you to the use of language) I would recommend that you use the most suggestive and general terms of reproach. Use such general terms as "infidel," "Unitarian," and "heretic." They cover a great many meanings, so that you can bring a great many charges under them. If you can not make one charge stick, you can try another—all under the same general charge of "infidelity." The infidelity is of different degrees of seriousness. You have the convenience of several effective synonyms, "unbelief," "skepticism," "doubt," "agnosticism," "atheism," "deism," etc. You will need to change your instruments from time to time, to avoid depriving them of edge and effectiveness. I fear that you have over-used some of your instruments in the past. They seem to have lost their edge in certain quarters.

One of the terms which seems to me to have been overworked by the profession is the term "higher critic;" the fact is that by a too loose and free and indiscriminate use of the term, people seem to have come to like him. At least they no longer seem to fear him. They invite him into their churches to preach and lecture, and into their homes to eat. You over-drew his picture when you gave him those horns and hoofs. The pictures you sent out in advance did not agree with the person himself when he appeared. The people saw the difference when they looked upon his fair face and listened to his fine words, and concluded that you had been trying to scare them. The better they got acquainted with him the better they liked him, and the less they found to fear in him. You let one or two of the cleverest of them get loose among the brethren, and I regret to say, they have seriously injured your business. I have heard a few say they would not believe you now, if you told them that quinine was bitter. They would sure have believed you if you had told them that quinine was sweet.

But such has been the history of very many names that were at first given in reproach. The names "Methodist" and "Baptist" were once names of reproach; but a man's standing would not be seriously injured in Protestant communities to-day if he were called a "Methodist" or "Baptist." It is coming to be so of "higher critic." There are still places where the person and the thing have been disowned; but there are other places where they could not get along without them. The

MORE THAN MONEY

A Minister Talks About Grape-Nuts.

"My first stomach trouble began back in 1895," writes a minister in Nebr., resulting from hasty eating and eating too much. I found no relief from medicine and grew so bad that all food gave me a great distress.

"It was that sore, gnawing, hungry feeling in my stomach that was so distressing and I became a sick man. Grape-Nuts was recommended as a food that could be easily digested.

"Leaving the old diet that had given me so much trouble, I began to eat Grape-Nuts with a little cream and sugar. The change effected in 24 hours was truly remarkable, and in a few weeks I was back to health again.

"My work as a minister calls me away from home a great deal, and recently I drifted back to fat meat and indigestible foods, which put me again on the sick list.

"So I went back to Grape-Nuts and cream and in four days I was put right again. The old dull headaches are gone, stomach comfortable, head clear, and it is a delight to pursue my studies and work.

"Grape-Nuts food is worth more than money to me and I hope this may induce some sufferer to follow the same course I have."

word is unfortunate for your purposes, for persecutors are not agreed among themselves that it is "always, everywhere, and by all," a bad thing. One of your own venerable company declared once in print, that it was "a legitimate art and has been employed by biblical scholars ever since the need of such investigations began to be realized." You ought to have coached him better. That statement has been used against you a great deal by the friends of persecuted critics. They say: "If it is a legitimate art, why do you anathematize a man for employing it?" Of course, they do not understand that it is an art which only two or three men among the Disciples can safely practice; and that no young man should be permitted to use it. I cite these facts as warnings against an ill-advised use of epithets. There is danger of the word "infidel" losing something of its awful stain by a too frequent use. I could name some men whom you have classed as infidels, who are put on the programs of our leading conventions. I would advise one of two things: either keep these men off future programs, or complete your demonstration of their infidelity. It must not be circulated that you have made a mistake.

From Presbyterian to Christian Church, by Way of Baptist

By DAVID MILLAR

I am of Scotch birth, my parents being Presbyterians of the Old School, descended from Covenanters. No wonder then they were strict and severe in the upbringing of their children and very pronounced in their religious views, which were Calvinistic in the extreme.

When I remember the "Sabbath days" of youthful years I almost expire, and feel thankful that children to-day are not called upon to grunt and sweat under the burden of Mosaic law; on the other hand I fear that Christian parents are sliding to the other extreme and becoming too lax in the use of the strap and in the observance of the Lord's day.

When I think of the minister and his sermon, I wonder what kind of a congregation he could pick up to-day. He was supposed to be a powerful preacher and the old beadle would point out with pride the evidences of the assertion to visitors, showing them several old pulpit Bibles that had been knocked to pieces by his fist (fine days for publishing houses). Nevertheless, I would sleep for the hour and a half that he exploited himself and only awoke when the hammering conclusion took place. I remember being as much afraid of the minister as I was of old Nick himself. I guess it was because I was a bad little rascal. (Totally depraved?)

Morning sermon began at 10 o'clock; ended at 1. Afternoon services, after kail dinner, began at 2; ended at 4. Sabbath school, 4 to 5. After tea about 7 o'clock, the "books" would be brought and all who could read would do so, verse about, four or five chapters being read.

I became a Christian the first time I heard the Gospel preached. Let me explain that in church, Sunday-school and home the teaching of early years was, be a good boy and you will go to heaven when you die. That was no "good news" to me. I knew I was anything but good, always in some mischief, a regular little Jonah always bringing trouble to myself and others, but as for dying I never thought of it, and so the promise of heaven at some time in the future was a very unsatisfactory thing, even if I was good enough to get there. But I heard the good news of Jesus, the Savior from sin, from the penalty, love and power of it, and I was told to believe and confess, and I did.

At midnight on the last day of a week, I knelt before God, reviewed my past life, realized my need of a Savior, determined upon complete submission and obedience to Christ, was reconciled to God and appropriated pardon of past sins on the ground that Christ had paid my debt on the cross of Calvary, and I enjoyed the peace that comes through pardon, and I began to live by the power that came after pardon. I united with the only church I knew anything of, the old blue stocking Presbyterian.

I immediately began to prepare for the ministry, and in due time began the work in the Presbyterian church.

In a few years I became interested in the "Second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ." In my study I entered the book of Acts of the Apostles and while reading it my thoughts were arrested and transferred from the Second coming of Christ to that of Pentecost with its wonders. I soon discovered how erroneous were my views regarding the Church of Christ and the first principles of Christianity.

I readily saw that in agreement with the promise made by Jesus, "I will build my church," that the establishment of the church upon earth was officially effected when the Holy Spirit was given on Pentecost, and that baptism was the initiatory rite whereby membership with all its privileges was obtained, and that baptism was immersion. As baptism was to be preceded by the "hearing of the Word" and belief of its facts, and by repentance of the mind, and confession of faith by the mouth, the logical conclusion was that only they who could hear the Word by which faith was created, only those who had need to repent and could exercise their will to determine and mouth to confess were the subjects of baptism.

Believe me, when I got this far I felt bad, and wanted to get rid of the whole thing. It was all new and strange, for at this time I had never seen a baptism (immersion). I was a Presbyterian of the Presbyterians, and seldom had been in any other church service until this time, and so one day I started out to get one of the most respected and scholarly divines of the Presbyterian church to put me back right. All the satisfaction I got was, "Do you think it is becoming in you to set yourself up in judgment against the scholarly and pious fathers of the church who have gone to their reward?"

Personal responsibility was one of the new thoughts that possessed me at this time. It was nothing to me whether the scholarly and pious men of old substituted sprinkling for Christian baptism; the question was, what must I do, and the answer was plain.

I placed the matter before a certain Baptist minister, a broad-minded independent man, who told me that although it was not just the Baptist way of doing things, that nevertheless he would baptize me (with two friends who desired baptism), on the confession of our faith. And this he did one Sunday evening.

I stayed in the Presbyterian church until it became evident that it would not "gee" and I retired from its fellowship.

The question now was where should I seek Christian fellowship, and the only answer was, with the Baptists. So I en-

SALLOW FACES

Often Caused by Coffee Drinking.

How many persons realize that coffee so disturbs digestion that it produces a muddy, yellow complexion?

A ten days' trial of Postum Food Coffee has proven a means, in thousands of cases, of clearing up bad complexions.

A Washn. young lady tells her experience:

"All of us—father, mother, sister and brother—had used tea and coffee for many years until finally we all had stomach trouble more or less.

"We were all sallow and troubled with pimples, breath bad, disagreeable taste in the mouth, and all of us simply so many bundles of nerves.

"We didn't realize that coffee was the cause of the trouble until one day we ran out of coffee and went to borrow some from a neighbor. She gave us some Postum and told us to try that.

"Although we started to make it, we all felt sure we would be sick if we missed our strong coffee, but we were forced to try Postum and were surprised to find it delicious.

"We read the statements on the pkg., got more and in a month and a half you wouldn't have known us. We were all able to digest our food without any trouble, each one's skin became clear, tongues cleaned off and nerves in fine condition. We never use anything now but Postum. There is nothing like it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville." "There's a reason."

tered the Baptist fold, knowing nothing of its customs. After doing evangelistic work for some time, I began an effort under the direction of the city missionary board of the Baptist church to organize a church in one of the needy fields of the city. After several weeks' work I had a goodly number who had made the confession of faith in Christ, and were waiting to be baptized. I asked the city missionary secretary where I would baptize the converts and got my medicine in the shape of Baptist usage. I was told that the converts would require to be baptized into the fellowship of a nearby Baptist church and then after a council had decided as to the advisability of the establishment of a church they would be granted letters. I asked this question of the Baptist ministers, "Did Paul after he preached and made converts in the city of Corinth, require to take them over to Ephesus and baptize them into the fellowship of that church before he could organize a church at Corinth?" The answer was of course in the negative. I concluded then that what Paul did was right and that it was the right thing for me to follow the apostle's method and I called together seven baptized believers and organized a Baptist church.

Now the puzzle was, where would I baptize the converts? I asked several Baptist ministers (whole souled men) for the use of their baptistries, but while all of them said they would be glad personally to grant my request, the deacons, they said, would object.

At this time I was told something about the Disciples of Christ. The Presbyterian minister who told me of them, said that he had lately met some members of the Christian church and they had explained their position to him and he thought that what I was teaching and preaching agreed with their teachings and preaching. He advised me to look up one of their ministers and have a talk with him. This I did the following day. Getting the address of the pastor of the Third Christian church from the city directory, I called upon him and after a morning's conversation, in which I stated my doctrinal position and experiences, the brother, George P. Rutledge, one of the grandest of men and a princely preacher, said, "Why, you belong to us," and invited me to use his baptistry. Next day he called upon me, accompanied by the pastor of the First Christian church, J. S. Myers, of Sedalia fame, who also kindly proffered the use of his baptistry, with the result that I baptized half the converts in each church pool.

Soon afterward, at a joint meeting of the Disciples of the city, I was extended the right hand of fellowship by Dr. E. E. Montgomery, on behalf of the Disciples and became a Christian in name, as well as in fact, and my "Baptist church" was henceforth known as a Christian church.

Thus I became identified with the brotherhood of believers called Disciples of Christ.

Religious Atavism

By W. T. Moore

Reversion to an ancestral type is a well known fact in physiology. Sometimes this reversion does not take place until two or three generations have passed. But no matter how long the time intervening may be, no one can doubt the striking resemblance to the ancestor whose type is reproduced. It is not strange that this law holds good in religious movements as well as in other things. Indeed, this tendency to revert to original conditions is so powerful that nearly every religious movement which has been inaugurated, in the history of the Christian Church, has ultimately reproduced in its development practically the same characteristics against which it stoutly protested when the movement was first started. As an illustration, it may be said that the Protestant reformation under Luther and those associated with him was mainly a plea for religious liberty, but after this liberty had been achieved there was a constant tendency to return to the original type from which the movement sprang, and it was not very long until the very liberty for which the movement contended was practically stranded in human creeds, thereby returning to the ancestral type from which the movement had its origin. It sometimes happens that these reversions give us even a worse type than that from which it originated. There is often an added increment of evil which seems to have developed in its proportions during the years wherein it was quietly sleeping, and when no one suspected that this evil would ever again become a controlling force in the religious world.

It may be well just now for the Disciples of Christ to study carefully this remarkable law. Their own religious movement, when considered from an historical point of view, had its origin in a condition of things which may not be very difficult to reproduce by the very law to which attention has been called. At this very time it seems to me that religious atavism is in the air. The great philosopher, Emanuel Kant, contended that there were just three things that must be postulated in order to explain man's present and eternal destiny. These three are God, liberty and immortality. These three were fundamental in the religious movement of the Disciples, with an immense emphasis on the second. Religious liberty, with the pioneers of our movement, was a priceless boon, and whoever will study carefully the history of the movement can not fail to notice that liberty was intensified in its importance by the remembrance of the slavery out of which the liberty came. Its ancestral relationship was religious despotism. Its plea was to break the bonds of human creeds and give to the world freedom of thought, freedom of speech and the right of individual interpretation. This, indeed, was the main thing for which our fathers contended. Everything else was in some respects subordinate to this great plea for liberty in the highest and best sense.

Will the movement now revert to the type out of which it came? This may easily result. When a movement becomes stereotyped in its principles, so that its growth is no longer possible, it is almost certain to revert back to the original type. Life requires movement of some kind. If we can not go forward, we must go backward. To stand still is death. Our religious movement has reached a point where some have written upon it "Ne plus ultra." This means death to the movement unless we begin to go backward, and this is precisely what some seem to be doing. They are not equal to meeting the demands of the new day in which we live, nor are they willing to regard our religious movement as capable of development in certain directions which are necessary to give it vitality and adaptation in the present state of the religious world, and consequently, if these Disciples move at all they must move backward, and that means a reversion to the type of Christianity which was prevalent when our movement had its beginning.

It is not necessary to manifest an ugly spirit about this fact. It is an inexorable law which many can not resist. Indeed, they are strengthened in their tendency by the conviction that they are doing God's service when they refuse to go forward in answer to the call of legitimate progress. They believe that progress means innovation. They have never gone further in their religious life than the Episcopal prayer book, which says: "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be." This is the rock on which some most excellent Christians are stranded. They are as conscientious as Saul of Tarsus was when he was persecuting the church of God. Their whole idea is to be consistent with the past, but there is a sense in which this consistency is, as Emerson declares, "The hob-goblin of fools." To be consistent with the past is to go back to the time when the Campbells began their religious movement, and then seek to reproduce the very religious condition out of which that movement came. The Campbells were themselves most inconsistent, as men generally understand consistency. Theirs was really a forward movement. It claimed to be a movement for the restoration of the ancient order of things, but it was this only so far as its principles are concerned. Its methods were alive with the new-born conditions of the world at that time. Its methods must still keep pace with the march of events. Its watchword must be "forward," and when we say that it is a movement "back to Christ," we must understand that this means back to his principles, to his teaching, to his great and virile life, while at the same time it means that our movement must go forward in its methods, in its adaptation to the age in which we live, in its enthusiasm and sacrifice for souls, and in its power of expansion and development in the great work of converting the world to Christ. Reproduction of the ancestral type may be our shame, and the only way to prevent this is to keep our faces forward and our movements toward the goal for which it is set, and our eyes steadily fixed upon him who is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, and consequently in whom there is neither past, present nor future, but only from everlasting to everlasting.

The Practice of Immortality

By Cephas Shelburne

Aristotle, long before the coming of Christ, with not a page of Revelation to guide him, depending wholly upon the light of reason, said to his disciples: "Live as nearly as you can the immortal life. "There is a such a thing as the practice of immortality, living the immortal life—the life that cannot die. I believe that man can create an immortal atmosphere for himself to live in, that he can seek the immortal things. Paul says we look for the things which are eternal, and he promises eternal life "to them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, and honor and immortality." He tells us that if we would have this immortality we must strive for it, practice it "if by any means we may attain to the resurrection of the dead." He would say to us, "Lay hold on eternal life."

Immortality is not something to be conferred upon one hereafter, it is here; you may be here and now living the immortal life. Jesus exhorts men to enter into life, eternal life, here; "to make the great hereafter a glorious here." This is the great thought that he brought to light, that he would have us believe and vitalize, that we are immortal, and being immortal that we should live accordingly; that our heredity is from God and we should therefore live as the sons of God. As David Gregg has truly said: "Cherish this truth, that you are immortal. Have no anxiety as to this fact, for that is settled. But let your anxiety be that you build into yourselves the things that are worthy your immortality and the things that you would like to see immortal."

Let this hope that is in you purify you, vitalize you, enrich all your life with great thoughts and interests, services and ends. Train all your powers, desires, emotions, acts into things that are divine, and that build up the heaven-life here and make you worthy of it there; the things that are meet for the inheritance of the saints in light. "Let your anxiety be to have a white soul for the white robes, and a spirit of praise for the harps of gold, and a thoroughly loyal personality for the everlasting crown."

What was it that gave Christ power over the grave, by which he was not holden of death? Not a power acting on the outside of him, not a power conferred upon him after the resurrection. He was the resurrection and the life. He had in himself the immortal life; like Victor Hugo, he was rising he knew toward the skies. There was power in him to rise again; there was no power in the grave to hold him and prevent him from rising. "Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up again." "I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." From the very beginning he was conscious of eternal life abiding in him. And this power was not conferred upon him by the Holy Spirit. It was a conscious element of his own nature and personality—he had it from childhood. He knew the grave had no victory and death no sting. The potter hath power over the clay, but clay hath no power over the maker and molder of clay. When Christ anointed the eyes of the blind man, he put his power and divinity into clay, and the clay made dead eyes to see. And so his divine personality gave resurrection power to the Arimathean tomb, and when the women came to see the sepulcher, the angel said: "He is not here; he is risen as he said."

The sublime truth of the resurrection does not rest on the resurrection; but the fact of the resurrection rests on the sublime truth of immortal life abiding in him. There was a current in his life that bore him onward, not toward a grave in the grass, not to Calvary simply but his life was moving toward resurrection, ascension and glorification. Of this he was conscious from the beginning. It was embodied in the angel's song at his birth; in the temple at the age of twelve, and before the descent of the Holy Spirit at his baptism. Every great event in Christ's life, every culminating point, was prophesied in his personality. He seemed always to be touching the future, pointing ahead, moving toward some far-off divine event. Great events issued out of his life, from the very springs of his being, and revealed his relations to the beyond. There is not a great event in the life of the Savior that can be explained, save as we see it in the declaration of the angel at the open tomb on the morning of the resurrection, saying to the women: "He is risen as he said."

Christ visibly put on immortality. There beamed from his very presence the immortal life; he lived it. When they would throw him over the cliff at Nazareth, without a stroke he passed through the midst of them unharmed. When they came to arrest him with swords and staves there went from his very presence a power that caused them to fall to the ground. The transfiguration was the manifestation of the glory in him. His face was set toward the radiant beyond, and was radiant with the beyond. Such a life was not confined to the narrow limits of space and time. There is a law that we reap what we sow. Christ literally reaped the life that he sowed. His goodness, character, nature and soul was not subject to the law of death.

And what is true of Christ is true of the followers of Christ. Their life, death and resurrection is like his. They have the power of an endless life within. He who lives the immortal life must reap life everlasting. You carry immortality in you here and now. The prophetic quality in life, in any life, has its source within, in the very structure of things—the divine principle, given within. You cannot kill love, pure mind and thought, goodness has no principle of death in it. These are the image of God in us. Let us see that the God-element remain not dormant in us; but let us develop it, bring it out, give it wings, aspiration, room to range, clearness of vision, the perspective of eternity. My conviction is that we live below ourselves, on the lower levels and we do not dwell on the summits. We undervalue and under-rate ourselves. We are wont to call ourselves poor, miserable, worms of the dust; we despise and neglect that which is within, and which is "so noble that it can be called the image of God." Let us accept the truth of the divine indwelling, believe in the highest, trust all these finer impulses of the soul, and live in accordance with them.

It is said of Robert Louis Stevenson that he was always hungry for the greater world; not the sham world of cities, clubs, commercialism, steam cars and all that, but the great world out of doors, the vast heavens above and the wide expanse of the seas; the world of mind, and spirit, heart and God. There is such a thing as the spirit's opening to the consciousness of who and what we are, whither and whence, and entering the larger life—the life of an immortal. We have only to look up at the sky; watch the rising and falling of the tides; the movement of the planets in their orbits; the floating of a luminous cloud "across the loveliness of a summer's day;" the opening of a flower—to realize that we and they are citizens of the immeasurable universe, affected by other worlds, and remote influences, and surrounded by the depths, the greatness and the splendor of God. And it is the spiritual side of man's nature, the image of God there, the immortal within—greater than our vocabulary, wider than the range of our bodies, more far-reaching and far-seeing than the natural eye and ear—that reaches out after the divine, that leaps up to catch this splendor, that lifts us out of the ordinary and into a region above time and space and dismal despair, and "floods all life with glory, helpfulness, hope and beauty"—the immortal soul in league with light. Keyed to its harmonies, responsive to its influences, living the life of an immortal.

Some Helps to a Study of the Holy Spirit

By Edgar D. Jones

Perhaps at no time in the history of the Disciples of Christ has there been so much interest manifested in the doctrine of the Holy Spirit as there is just now. Nor is this interest confined by any means to the Disciples. The convention programs and publications of the various religious bodies afford evidence that this subject is receiving general attention. For a full year the writer's special readings have been on this theme and he wishes to make acknowledgment of four books that have helped him in the study of the Spirit's ministry.

There isn't, by the way, very much literature on the Holy Spirit, and what there is is of recent date. One author says that the past nineteen years have seen more literature on this subject than all the rest of the nineteen hundred years together. And yet the bulk is not large. A casual scanning of catalogues would seem to convince one that there are less than fifty books of recognized merit on the subject. So far as the writer has been able to learn there have been but three widely read books on the Holy Spirit published by the Disciples of Christ, viz., Dr. Richardson's excellent work; "A Symposium on the Holy Spirit," with chapters by A. B. Jones, Thos. Munnell, G. W. Longan, J. Z. Taylor and A. Campbell, published by John Burns, in 1879, and the recent volume by J. H. Garrison.

Now for the four helpful books referred to above.

1. "The Ministry of the Spirit," by Dr. A. J. Gordon. This is doubtless the most popular book ever written on the subject. It is so well known that extended comment on it is unnecessary. Its author was a choice character. His was a spirit-filled life. For many years this beloved pastor sought with success to impress on his congregation the fact that the Holy Spirit dwells literally in the Christian and that he is ready if he finds a willing people, to oversee and administer all that pertains to the affairs of the body of Christ. There have been wealthier churches than Dr. Gordon's, churches larger numerically and with statelier edifices perhaps, but it is doubtful if there has been anywhere in modern times a church so intensely spiritual, so genuinely worshipful, and so free from occasions of criticisms as was his.

The secret of it all was simply this. Dr. Gordon and his congregation looked to God not only for salvation, but also for power through his Spirit. Such a man and such a church commend the book to say nothing of the intrinsic worth of its ten chapters.

2. "The Indwelling Christ," by James M. Campbell, author of "Saved to the Uttermost," "After Pentecost What?" etc. The introduction to the little volume is written by Professor A. B. Bruce, of the Free Church College, Glasgow. There are eighteen chapters, all worth one's while to read. The one on "The Abiding Presence" is especially good. The author heads it with Whittier's well known lines:

"No fable old, no mythic lore,
Nor charms of bards or seers,
No dread fact stranded on the shores
Of the oblivious years;

But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present life is He,
And faith hath yet its Olivet
And love its Galilee!"

Then he says:

"The familiar refrain 'Jesus of Nazareth passeth by,' ought to be changed into 'Jesus of Nazareth standeth by.' He is not here to-day and away to-morrow. He is perpetually present. He lives and moves in the midst of us. He is nearer to us than any one else, nearer to us than we are to ourselves. * * * * * * * * * He is something more than the Christ of history—a blessed memory; or the Christ of prophecy—a sublime hope. He is the Christ of to-day, and of every day, a living reality in our lives, a very present help in time of need. * * * * * * * An absent Lord! Think of it; and yet he has said, 'Lo, I am with you all the days, even unto the consummation of the ages!' A friendless stranger! Think of it; and yet he says, 'I will not leave you orphans, I will come unto you.' Why should the church keep mourning the absence of her Lord when she has the assurance of his abiding presence? Why should the spouse of the ever living Christ sit down in the dust, clad in the weeds of widowhood, bewailing the loss of the Lord when he is really present with her? Why should believers in a risen Christ dolefully sing, 'Down life's dark vale we wander till Jesus comes,' when they ought rapturously to sing 'Joy to the world the Lord is come?'"

Both of these books are published by Revell. Neither book is very new, the former having been published in 1894; the latter in 1895.

3. "A Help to the Study of the Holy Spirit," by William E. Biederwolf. This volume differes in toto from the two just mentioned in so far as the method of treating the subject is concerned. The book is in a way a compilation of many works on the subject. The author evidently read everything on the subject he could find besides making a careful study of the New Testament references to the Spirit. In his thirteenth chapter, besides some independent studies, Mr. Biederwolf gives the views of distinguished preachers and exegetes on controverted points such as "The Baptism of the Spirit," and then endeavors to decide the issue by an appeal to the Scriptures as the arbiter and final test. It can scarcely be said that the results are always satisfactory but the work is reverent and in many places instructive. A most excellent feature of this book is the bibliography it contains. Nearly everything that has been published on the Holy Spirit since John Owen issued his book in 1674, is in the list and the volumes especially helpful are starred. The Winona Company, of Chicago, is the publisher of this work.

And last, but by no means least, "The Holy Spirit," by J. H. Garrison. Its twelve chapters are all good. The writer has read them again and again and he has turned oftenest to and lingered longest over the one on "Blessings from the Holy Spirit."

Leaving out of consideration for the present all controverted points and differences here is a book with a message for every follower of the Christ. It is so wholesome, so sane, so devotional in its treatment of the subject that one could wish the volume were twice as thick. The timeliness of this book must be apparent to many. For nearly two thousand years we have been saying, "I believe in the Holy Spirit." Surely it were time for us to say what we believe about him and how much we believe in him.

Finally the writer wishes to say that he has received encouragement in his study of this subject from his older brethren in the ministry. Not long ago a well known elderly minister among the Disciples of Christ came across the writer in a book store. The elderly preacher looked at the book which the writer was examining, and on seeing it was a work on the Holy Spirit, he said:

"Few things give me more pleasure these days than the fact that our young ministers are giving time to the study of the Holy Spirit. It augurs well for the future of our people."

"As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod,
Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God.
I will fly in the greatness of God as the marsh-hen flies,
In the freedom that fills all the space 'twixt the marsh and the skies.
By so many roots as the marsh-grass sends in the sod
I will heartily lay me a hold on the greatness of God."

What can I give him,
Poor as I am?
If I were a shepherd,
I would bring a lamb,
If I were a wise man,
I would do my part—
Yet what I can, I give him,
Give my heart.

Our Budget

—Church Extension Day September second!

—Church extension has right of way through August and September—

—Naturally the most unfavorable season of the year. Let us chivalrously "overcome nature with grace."

—Do not preach last year's Church Extension sermon. Prepare a new one; make it glitter with latest statistics, make it ring with, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself;" make it effective by putting your soul into the weaving of it, and all your strength into its presentation.

—Other mission funds are like bread—consumed by use. Church extension funds, like love or power, continually increase by use. What prestige we will have when it is said: "The Churches of Christ have $1,000,000 in one of their funds"! A little more than $100,000 annually will place $1,000,000 with our Board of Church Extension by 1909. We can get it. We will.

—R. W. Mills, of Bartley, Neb., will give churches needing an efficient minister helpful information.

—The new church at Ocean Park, Cal., was dedicated August 5, F. M. Rains assisting the pastor, Geo. Ringo.

—C. C. Atwood is in the midst of a great meeting at Circleville, Kan. Seven additions at last report and large audiences.

—The Greeley, Colo., church will begin revival meeting September 2. Evangelist Charles E. McVay will have charge of the music.

—The church building at Salem, Ind., W. G. Allen, minister, has been enlarged and remodeled. Dedicatory services will be held August 26, F. T. Porter, of New Albany, assisting the pastor.

—W. H. Wilson, of Texmo, Okla., assisted by O. C. Otis as singer, is holding revival services with fine prospects of establishing a thriving congregation there.

—The Forrest, Ill., congregation under the leadership of pastor J. W. Reynolds has outgrown half-time preaching and wishes to locate a minister for full time.

—M. J. Thompson has been called to the Dayton, Ore., church. Brother Thompson's record is in itself a prediction of a day of larger things for Dayton.

—C. F. Kimball, assisted by F. M. O'Neal and wife as singers, has just closed a two weeks' meeting at Seiling, Okla., resulting in 26 additions to the church.

—The pulpit of the Rowland street church, Syracuse, N. Y., is vacant. An able energetic preacher is desired by the membership. Address Geo. H. Doust, 208 Richmond Ave.

—N. M. Baker, of Meridian, Miss., will be assisted in an evangelistic campaign through November by R. H. Crossfield, of Owensboro, Ky., and J. E. Harris, singing evangelist.

—The venerable N. A. Walker, of St. Elmo, Ill., whose zeal has never waned with the flight of years, is in a meeting at Douglass, Ill., with excellent prospects for a most helpful revival.

—James A. Challener has resigned his ministry at the Ross Avenue Church, Dallas, Texas, and accepted the work at Artesia, New Mexico. We wish Brother Challener and his new church great usefulness and abundant evidences of success.

—A. R. Spicer, assisted by E. A. Gilliland, of Clinton, Ill., is holding revival services at Moweaqua, Ill. He writes: "Meeting moves with power; in the second week, twenty-two added."

—J. R. Perkins, of Huntsville, assisted B. F. Goslin in a two weeks' meeting at New Hope, near Columbia, Mo. Twelve were added to the membership and the church greatly edified.

—A letter from Mrs. A. J. Alderman, of Monterey, Mexico, states that the work of the mission with which she is identified is greatly prospering, notwithstanding the intense tropical heat.

—E. O. Sharpe, of Winchester, one of our most successful Illinois pastors and an able preacher, is compelled to seek a warmer clime. This is a good opportunity for one of our southern churches to secure a very successful minister.

—C. W. Comstock, assisted by Professor Butler and wife, of Mound City, Mo., as singing evangelists, is in a meeting at Orrick, Mo. Large audiences are in attendance and a good interest is manifested.

—J. H. Hardin, with his faithful companion, is in the enjoyment of his beloved Macatawa. No one among us is more entitled to a few weeks' free hearted playtime than Missouri's able Bible school superintendent.

—Lew C. Harris, who began work with the Logan, Ia., church last April, writes that his "work is progressing very acceptably. The audiences are increasing in spite of the hot weather and everything looks prosperous."

—At the last reports thirty-four had been added to the Ennis, Tex., church during a revival in which pastor R. D. Shults is being assisted by W. E. and Clyde Harlow, evangelists. Brother Harlow begins a meeting at Sharon, Pa., in September.

—As we go to press the Audrain county (Mo.) convention is in session at Vandalia and the Pike county convention at Bowling Green. We hope for encouraging reports from these gatherings for our readers in next week's issue.

—Eugene McFarland, of the Fourth Church, this city, is in a very promising meeting at Elvins, Mo. Brother McFarland uniformly preaches the Gospel with a simplicity and earnestness most helpful to church and community wherever he goes.

—Evangelist H. E. Wilhite is in a good meeting at Belpre, Kan., that has already outgrown the seating capacity of the building where it began. The church has been organized during the meeting. Money is being gathered to house the new church.

—Alfred Munyon is in a meeting at Bucklin, Mo., assisted by home forces, and also 100 copies per week of The Christian-Evangelist, that are being distributed into the homes of the people whom it is especially desired should be interested in the services.

—The new church building at Rensselaer, Ind., will be dedicated the first Lord's day in September. G. H. Clarke, minister, will be assisted by Evangelist J. H. O. Smith. A cordial invitation is extended all Disciples who can to attend these ceremonies.

—Secretary J. H. Mohorter reports the Benevolent Association has just come into possession of $1,581.83 from the estate of Richard C. Weirick, deceased, late of St. Louis. This good man, "though dead yet speaketh," his benevolent spirit lingers in the world to bless.

—Robert H. Newton, of Normal, Ill., has almost guaranteed a great meeting in his church for October by uniting with him S. E. Fisher, of Champaign, as preacher, and H. A. Easton, of Chicago, as singer. The church is well prepared for this evangelistic campaign.

—Evangelist H. A. Northcutt is assisting Pastor Pierce in a meeting at Knox City, Mo. Prophet Northcutt is not without honor even in his home city, for splendid audiences are in nightly attendance and a number of the evangelist's old friends have already come to the Savior.

—Isom Roberts, railroad secretary for the Oklahoma convention which meets at El Reno September 3-6, writes us that the roads have granted one and one-third fare for round trip on the certificate plan. Ministers are requested to inform delegates they must secure certificates from the starting point.

—R. S. Smedley is another of our heroic southwestern preachers. In the last five years he has organized twenty-four congregations and helped build thirty-one church homes. He has held a great many meetings and added hundreds to the churches and has not yet retired from the active ministry.

—C. E. Swartz, assisted C. F. McCall, in a meeting at Friendship, Mo., that resulted in thirty additions to the church. Brother McCall states that he celebrated his last birthday by baptizing his first converts. This will be a beautiful tie between him and those whom he assisted into the new life in Christ.

—W. M. Baker, of Meridian, Miss., recently concluded a 12 days' meeting with the church at Tupelo, Miss. There were eight additions, four being by confession and baptism. Brother Baker writes there is great need of preachers in Mississippi, but that it is not a great field for preachers unwilling to serve for small salaries.

—A. Sterling, of Warrensburg, held a three weeks' meeting for W. W. Blalock at Metz, Mo., with twenty-eight additions—one from the Baptists, four from the Methodists and twenty-three by confession and baptism. Fourteen of the new members are young men. Brother Blalock very highly commends the earnestness and ability of the evangelist.

—W. P. Bentley, the missionary, has so far regained his health as to assume the superintendency of the Asiatic work in the home land under the auspices of the C. W. B. M. The efforts of the board will first be directed to building a hospital in San Francisco and then teaching Christ to the Chinese students at the University of California.

—E. O. Sharpe, writing of the Winchester, Ill., meeting says, "Our meeting goes on with gathering force and promise. I believe we will yet crack this old shell and under God bring things to pass. I have learned to love and admire Brother Violett as I have but few men. He is worthy of all praise for his fidelity to the truth in Christ and the beauty of his Christian life."

—The official board of the Chandler, Okla., church sends a statement concerning Bro. Oscar Ingold, their pastor, highly eulogistic of his life and preaching. It sets forth that "Brother Ingold's preaching is clear and logical, upheld by the spirit of love. He does not shun to preach the whole Gospel, and he loves to plead for Christian union according to the primitive plan."

A Wonderful Tonic

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

Cooling, refreshing and invigorating. Dispels that dragged out feeling during spring and summer.

—Friends and admirers of John L. Brandt, of the First Church of this city, will regret to learn he is suffering from another very serious attack of appendicitis.

—We are pleased to learn that Sister Stahl, of Kansas City, is recovering from her long and dangerous illness. Bro. W. L. Stahl of 318 Temple block, can be secured by some church or churches adjacent to Kansas City, for Lord's day preaching.

—C. R. Noe, of Kansas, has just added another $100 to his $600 previously given to the National Benevolent Association on the annuity plan. J. H. Mohorter, 903 Aubert avenue, St. Louis, will answer all inquiries concerning the annuity plan and the work of the association.

—H. F. Davis, of this House, is temporarily supplying the pulpit at High Hill, Mo., and reports the work there in a most encouraging state. R. B. Havener will begin a meeting early in October, at which time it is hoped sufficient money will be secured to build a new church home.

—S. D. Dutcher, of Omaha, assisted by Charles E. McVay, singer, concluded a brief meeting at Eldon, Mo., the 15th, resulting in 38 additions, principally by primary obedience. Pastor J. F. Bickel has done excellent work with this congregation and his personal efforts had much to do with the success of the meeting. Brother Dutcher's preaching is very highly commended.

—Evangelist O. P. Spiegel, of Birmingham, Ala., and Baxter Golightly conducted the religious exercises of the west central Texas camp meeting at Caddo, extending from July 19 to August 5. These brethren are already planning for the greatest meeting of their lives in the same place next year.

—This sad intelligence was taken from a Monday's daily:

> Danville, Ill., August 19.—Last Friday the Christian Church at Wallace, Ind., an inland town, nine miles south of Hillsboro, was struck by lightning. Mrs. Lulu Belles was killed and Ura Shoaff and Tessie Philpott were injured. The church was struck early in the afternoon while sixteen women members of a church society were rehearsing for an entertainment. The church caught fire and was badly damaged.

—Wm. J. Lockhart, of Des Moines, will assist W. E. Reavis, of Webb City, Mo., in an evangelistic campaign through November. The Webb City brethren have completed a new gallery in their church increasing the seating capacity to 700. W. E. M. Hackleman will assist in the meeting as musical director. We predict a Pentecostal blessing to this church.

—Mrs. J. D. Richards, formerly of the Hammett Place church, St. Louis, now of El Campo, Tex., writes there is a great dearth of faithful preachers in that part of Texas. Men able to give a reason for the hope that is within them and who will preach by example as well as precept are greatly needed. Sister Richards will gladly assist any such brethren to locate in Texas.

—W. B. Clemmer, of Council Bluffs, Ia., is spending his vacation with the mission church at Sterling, Colo. Arthur Wake, of La Junta, is leading the singing. There are good audiences and 13 additions the first ten days, 11 being by confession and baptism. Brother Clemmer writes that the Sterling and Atwood churches (six miles distant) will need a pastor September 1.

—J. W. Reynolds has just closed a successful year's work with the churches at Saunemin and Forrest, Ill., and is open for engagement with some active church. During the year the two congregations raised for all purposes $4,200, $350 of which went for missions. Brother Reynolds is a Hiram graduate, has been preaching for eight years and has been successful both as pastor and evangelist.

—W. H. Wilson, of Texmo, Okla., is another of our preachers "of whom this world is not worthy." For many years he has labored without material compensation in the great Southwest for the upbuilding of the cause of primitive Christianity. He is growing old and pleads for younger preachers to come to take the place of himself and other veterans almost worn out in the service. We trust many young preachers will write him volunteer-

There is

No Good Reason
Against Good Insurance

Nor any substitute for it. Wherever failure to live means financial loss, there is call for Insurance. Is your life of financial value to another—your family, partners or business? If so, Life Insurance deserves your attention, and deserves it now. Your forethought will be better than their afterthought. ¶ When it comes to the best kind of Life Insurance, men do not all think alike. There is no desirable kind that cannot be obtained from THE MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY. This is the oldest active Life Insurance Company in America, and the largest and staunchest in the world. It is a Mutual Company. It has no stockholders. Its assets belong to its policy-holders. It has paid them dividends continuously for fifty-six years. Taking its history through, has done as well for its policy-holders as any company. It should have done better, as has recently been shown. Under the present management all policy-holders may expect unusually favorable results. This is made reasonable by the facts that it is a strictly Mutual Company, operated under New York laws, which are now the best in the world; that its great volume of business means smaller share of expense on each policy, and that the new methods and economies, which are now a part of its constitution, will save immense sums which must go to the policy-holders, as the only proper place. ¶ Mr. Charles E. Hughes, who became famous by conducting the investigation of the Legislative Committee, and who speaks with authority, has recently said: "We have had great companies exposed to close and unsparing analysis, only to find that their solidity was as the rock of Gibraltar. I would rather take insurance in a New York company compelled to transact business under these restrictions, than in any company not so restricted, and I believe that will be the sentiment of the people of these United States."

The Mutual Life

—J. F. Callahan is contemplating a reprint of the Millennial Harbinger of 1863. Those interested may address him at Euclid, O.

—J. J. Limerick, Corning, Cal., may be secured for protracted meetings this fall and winter, in northern California, Oregon and Washington.

—A most cordial welcome home, John J. Handsaker. It is a far cry from Kingston, Jamaica, to Hoquiam, Wash., but such men as you are greatly needed in our northwest—and everywhere.

—There is great need of pastoral work in the church at Lenora, Okla. The salary will be small but quick and most helpful results may be achieved by a man of consecrated ability. Such a one may write R. H. Manning.

—The indefatigable F. E. Day, of Nelson, Neb., has appointed October 7 next as the time at which all his church's indebtedness must be paid in full. He is sanguine of success. He is greeted with large audiences each Lord's day and additions are frequent.

—J. D. Babb will assist Pastor S. E. Hendrickson in a meeting at Hermitage, Mo., beginning August 27. The Hickory county, Mo., convention will be held at Wheatland September 12 and 13. We are hoping our people will take greater interest in the county and district conventions. They should be to our state and national conventions what the families are to our congregation.

—Use the pink circular found in this paper to send us the name of a new subscriber to The Christian-Evangelist. You may be placing the paper in a home where for twenty-five years it will be second only to the Bible as a lamp to the feet of friends and a light to their pathway. The salvation of immortal souls may be largely due to your ministry.

—Henry J. Lunger concluded his meeting at Tallapoosa, Ga., July 12. There were four additions by confession and baptism and one from the Baptists. The prayer-meetings which had been neglected were resumed, and the Christian Endeavor, which had had no meetings for three years, was reorganized. The church wishes to engage a minister at once. If the right man comes, the future of the church seems very bright.

—H. J. Lunger's last revival conducted as evangelist for the Western District of Georgia was at Carrollton, and closed July 30. There were five additions to the church by confession and baptism. Our people had held no services for the last three years and part of the time denominationalists were using the building. Brother Bellonby paved the way for this reorganization by his faithful ministry for a few months preceding the revival. A Bible school has been organized and the work of the church begun in real earnest.

Faris, former missionary to South Africa, later of the "Texas Courier," and now called to a chair in Texas Christian University, paid a visit to this office Monday while returning to Dallas from attendance on lectures at Chicago University. Brother Faris' usefulness to the churches bids fair to measure up to that of his father's, the veteran preacher and editor, G. A. Faris, and that is honor enough for any man.

—A stenographic error made the second editorial in last week's issue "Business Side of Christian Union," instead of "Business Side of Christianity," as intended by its author, but it was a ringing and helpful advocacy of Church Extension even under its strange title. After all, Church Extension may perhaps do as much for Christian union as any other means we are employing, and the terms be more nearly synonymous than appears at first glance.

—Harry D. Smith, of Hopkinsville, Ky., writes that the South Kentucky Missionary Association owns "two board and tuition scholarships" in South Kentucky College, which it wishes to exchange for preaching in the vicinity of Hopkinsville. Any young preacher wishing additional school advantages under these conditions may write President A. C. Kuykendall, W. J. Hudspeth or H. D. Smith, at Hopkinsville, Ky.

—Bros. R. S. Harvey and Franklin, of Eldon, Mo., have just presented the local congregation with an excellent modern parsonage. Would that their example were emulated all over the country! Many ministers are greatly embarrassed to find homes in our smaller cities and towns at all creditable to the membership they represent. Let us seek to inaugurate a parsonage building era in the material development of our churches.

—The secular press reports a gift of $40,000 from the venerable A. B. Teachout, of Cleveland, O., to Cotner University. While this report has not been verified to us by either the alleged donor or President Aylsworth, of Cotner, it is so characteristic of the Christlike generosity of Brother Teachout that we give the report for what it is worth. Surely we are entering into an era of princely giving by Disciples for the cause of Christ.

—J. F. Stevens, of La Junta, Colo., organized a church of 21 members at Silver City, New Mexico, last spring. The congregation desires a minister to locate with them. The church can pay but a small salary at the beginning, but prospects are good for upbuilding the church and increasing the salary. Silver City is described as a delightful place of residence. Ministerial volunteers for this field are requested to write Miss Lizzie Young.

—W. B. Blakemore, of Lexington, assisted Pastor Aden Bristow in a two weeks' meeting at Connersville, Ky., resulting in 32 additions—25 by confession and baptism. This church was organized one year ago with 15 members and now has 81. It has a Bible readers' union and a normal training class and is in a healthy, growing condition. The pastor speaks very highly of the evangelist's ability to effectively preach the old Jerusalem Gospel.

—Percy G. Cross, of Hope, Ark., is in a brief meeting at Okolona, Ark., with seven additions to date. He writes, "The Christian-Evangelist of August 9, is the best yet. Give us more articles like E. L. Frazier's. 'Who is a Christian in the Twentieth Century?' To us laboring in the South such articles are inspirational. Brother Frazier's 'Here I stand,' to-day, in this turmoil of creed revision, etc., deserves to stand with Luther's great expression, 'Here stand I.' "

"Help us to get into our own church home."

ARE YOU READY

to enlist your congregation for Church Extension in SEPTEMBER?

The Board at Kansas City ceased promising loans in March and have asked for aid in building since then, and $125,000 is needed for these appeals. Inspiration enough, you say, to enlist any Church of Christ in the Annual Offering.

93 WORTHY MISSIONS

WRITE AT ONCE,

ordering literature and collection envelopes, and tell the Board you will take the offering.

The Annuity feature of Church Extension is profitable to you and the Board. You receive 6 per cent and the Board builds churches with your money. Write for information to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo.

—John L. Brandt has recently completed five years' ministry at the First Christian Church of St. Louis. During that period there have been more than 800 accessions to the church; more than $5,000 expended in repairs, and twenty-one young men and three young women have gone forth from his congregation to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ. This makes a total of more than fifty young men he has been instrumental in turning to the ministry.

—The Dennison, Texas, "Daily Herald" prints George W. Lee's first anniversary sermon that, the paper says, was delivered before a large audience at the First Christian Church August 12. The sermon contains the following report: Sermons preached, 105; funerals, 19; marriages, 10; pastoral visits, 1,328; additions to the church, 77—58 by letter and statement and 19 by confession and baptism; letters granted, 17. Net gain, 60. Money raised, $1,325.35. At the close of the services the official board held a business session and heartily endorsed Brother Lee's ministry.

—The Central Church, Columbus, O., was among the very first, if not the first, to place an order for the new hymnal, "Gloria in Excelsis." Our people are delighted with it. It looks like a "hymnal." There is a character, there is dignity about it. Its arrangement is well-nigh perfect. The good music, the stately music, the great hymns are all there. Its mechanical get-up reflects credit upon its publishers. We expect to order 150 more copies for our new church building.—Walter Scott Priest, Columbus, O.

—The Kansas State Missionary Society will meet at Parsons September 17-20. The Parsons brethren are making preparations to entertain at least 500 delegates. Lodging and breakfast will be free, dinners and suppers served in the basement of the church for 20 cents and 25 cents. A flat rate of one and one-third fare has been granted by the railroads. No certificates are necessary. Tickets on sale September 16-18 going, and up to and including September 23 returning.

—Wallace M. Stuckey, assisted by his daughter, Ethel, as singing evangelist, is having great success at Galesburg, Kan. Two-thirds of his large audiences consist of young folk. The people are earnestly reading The Christian-Evangelist that he distributes among the audiences in order to learn our position and as an inspiration unto all righteousness. There are bright hopes of a large ingathering to the church in addition to the confirmation of the faith of the saints and the interest aroused in the breasts of sinners.

—During Brother Garrison's sojourn at Pentwater he unfolds the Word of Life to assembled Disciples each Lord's day. In part, at least, through his efforts there are now excellent prospects of a perfect union of the Christian and Baptist congregations. If this is effected it will be another beautiful illustration of the sunshine of brotherly love's doing more than the blustering winds of debate and party pride in causing those who truly love the Lord to discard the mantle of sectarianism and walk arm in arm toward the beautiful gate.

—The secretary of the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of Missouri has sent circulars broadcast over the state advising citizens that 17 senators and 144 representatives in the next state legislature will be elected in November. The circular states "It is not less essential for us to prevent any one from taking a seat in our legislature disposed to ruin the business we are engaged in. Prohibitionists are fanatics. It is important that every citizen of this state vote against a candidate who is backed by the anti-saloon league or the prohibition party. It is your duty to interview your candidates and let them declare how they stand on the liquor question. Vote and work for those that are with you irrespective of your political affiliations." When, oh when, will "the children of light" be as wise in their day and generation as the children of this present world?

—We are greatly surprised to learn that E. B. Bagby has resigned the pastorate of the Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., to accept the pastorate of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland. For the past fifteen years Brother Bagby has preached for the Ninth Street Church, and it was generally understood that, like his illustrious mentor, F. D. Power, he had received a life sentence to the Nation's capital. Under his influence the church has grown from a little mission of sixty-five members to a membership of more than 1,100, and he is become one of the most popular and able ministers of the city. We most heartily congratulate Ohio over this accession to her ministerial ranks and particularly the Franklin Circle Church in securing the services of one so endued with evangelistic fervor, so gifted as a pastor, and helpful as counselor and friend.

—One of the finest things said recently about The Christian-Evangelist comes from a preacher in the far west, who, on his way to Kentucky for a visit, stopped off at the Grand Canyon of Arizona and writing from the sublimities of that place says: "I could not help but think of the good work being done by The Christian-Evangelist. You know there are individuals and papers that deal with small truths. I am glad that The Christian-Evangelist emphasizes Grand Canyon truths." The sublime truths and facts of God in revelation are worthy to be compared with the sublimest things in nature, and The Christian-Evangelist has tried to concern itself with some of the deepest and most vital truths of Christianity. That there are men and women by the thousand that appreciate our efforts in this direction is no small compensation for our labor.

—Don Quixote never tilted a lance to less purpose than did the white plumed knight of the Rockies in his cheerful demolition of the Budget paragraph that would have our new church at Manchester "patterned in every particular after the Jerusalem model." The Jerusalem brethren may not have been as enthusiastic for world wide missions, or as dignified in their worship as Brother Tyler wishes they had been, but we confidently maintain that the church Christ had in mind when he said: "And on this rock I will build my church" was builded in Jerusalem, and notwithstanding all opposition was builded just as Christ wished it to be. The life and spirit of that church may not have found perfect expression through its early membership, nevertheless all the ages will continue going back to Jerusalem for a divine pattern of the model Church of Christ or the gates of Hades will prevail against it.

Announcement.

I desire to announce that the "Hughes Key to the Revelation of Jesus Christ Which God Gave Unto Him to Show to His Servants," is now in the hands of the printer.

"Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of prophecy and keep the things which are written therein."

"Let him that hath an ear hear what the Spirit saith to the churches."

"And the angel said to me: these are the true words of God and faithful."

"Here is wisdom: He that hath understanding let him consider the number of the beast for it is the number of man."

"I will tell thee the mystery. Here is the meaning which hath wisdom, the seven heads of the beast are the seven mountains."

A Home in Decatur, Ill.

My pastorate with the First Church of Christ, Danville, Ill., will close September 30, 1906. I expected to remain with this church longer, but I find it best to terminate my work here as above stated. A report of the work will be given about October 1.

I have made no request for another pastorate, though I am as able for such work as I have been for the past fifteen years. I have bought a home in Decatur, Ill., to which I expect to move early in October. The Lord willing Decatur

—The Young People's Bible Class of the First Christian Church, St. Louis, Mo., has an enrollment of 234, and has had an average attendance during the summer months of more than 100. The attendance is much larger during the school period, when students from all parts of the country are in the city attending the various colleges. The class is well organized, with officers and committees, and has regular monthly business meetings. The social feature is manifested in the class picnics, trolley rides, boat excursions, lawn fetes, banquets, etc. These are conducted with a dignity that becometh Christians. The members of this class have raised during the past twelve months, by personal and class offerings, more than $3,000 for church, missionary and benevolent work. These offerings are made cheerfully, and many with great sacrifice. The class has sent out many well trained church workers for the Master. The three superintendents of the Sunday-school and ten of the fourteen teachers, the presidents and most of the committeemen in the Christian Endeavor societies, and the superintendent and most of the teachers in the Chinese mission have been trained in this Bible class. Best of all, out of this class has gone forth twenty-one young men for the ministry and two young ladies for the missionary field. Nine of these are now in the field preaching, and the others will enter college this fall to make a more thorough preparation for the ministry. The class is made up of consecrated soul winners who have caught the spirit and enthusiasm of their pastor and teacher, John L. Brandt.

will be our permanent home. Whatever work may come to me in Decatur, or the neighboring churches, I shall cheerfully accept and do as unto the Lord. Any church or churches within easy reach of Decatur needing such services as I can give, and desiring it, can address me till the last of September as below.

Missouri Missions and Church Extension.

We have just closed a four weeks meeting here with J. Clarence Read, of Fulton, Ky., doing the preaching. There were 12 additions, 2 by confession and 10 by letter. One of the greatest blessings of the meeting came from a member of the Methodist church in the shape of the best lot in town for a church building. Brother Read is a great worker, and held the attention of a large tent full every night. People who have never heard the plea of our people have become interested in it. Hundreds of people in this part of the state have never heard our cause preached and knew nothing about us nor what we stood for. There is no use of hunting places where our plea is unknown. We have thousands in the state of Missouri that know nothing whatever of it. We have not a church building in Scott county, and only this one organization. All wishing to help the Cause can help us build on the lot we had given to us here. Think of it, a town of 3,000 people in the great state of Missouri and not a church of the brotherhood in the entire county, in which this town is situated. Can you find a more inviting field in the entire country? That is not all, this is the richest town in dollars and cents in the world, size considered. Money is their god.

We want a preacher now that is a good hustler and a good preacher as well. One that can preach the love of Christ, and present our cause in a loving way to this people. We can and will have a congregation of several hundred in a few years if we can but get a building, and we are going to get it; for we have several hundred dollars pledged already.

Have the brethren in the state to look this way for a while, and get this part of Missouri under the banner of our Cause.

We meet now in the opera house, but will later get a better building for our place of worship. Pray that the Lord may be with the people in this part of Missouri, and especially to help the church at Sikeston.

Sikeston, Mo. Clarence F. Bruton.

Struck Twelve.

I refer to Herbert Yeuell in his recent evangelistic campaign in Manchester, N. H. I doubt that any man among us in pioneer work ever left a better first impression. The many favorable newspaper reports indicate that he "struck twelve." He is to return in the near future and prosecute the work until he organizes a strong Christian church. The meeting cost more than $1,200, the rental of the opera house being the heaviest item of expense. I have known single meetings to cost one of our congregations from $2,000 to $2,500, so the cost of this meeting was not excessive. Indeed, in view of what promises to come of it, the cost is light.

But it is unjust and ungenerous in us to permit the deficit of $400 or $500 to fall on one man, Bro. J. H. Garrison. Will our great, strong, wealthy brotherhood permit it? The work is ours, not his. Let a hundred more have immediate fellowship in it. Send a generous offering to Brother Garrison at once, or if sent to me and marked for the Manchester, N. H., meeting, I will forward it. Let us receive $500 within two weeks.

For a Church in New Hampshire.

Total	$812 25

For years Brother Smith labored for the establishment of the kingdom in the Orient. He now gives of his means for the institution of a New Testament church in a neglected portion of the home land. The new church will not be suffered to languish and perish. One of our missionary societies that never fails in bringing its enterprises to successful consummations will care for the young organization till its own resources are sufficient to make it strong, enabling it to keep the lamp of truth gleaming afar, and its membership to be a rugged crew saving the lives of multitudes engulfed in indifference and error more dangerous than Atlantic's tides that beat against Manchester's rocky portals.

We appeal to our brethren for an additional $500, enabling us to resume the meeting and found the church. Act at once on the noblest impulse of your heart and send Brother Garrison a check or draft for the amount of fellowship you wish in establishing a church in New Hampshire.

Adding Machines.

Would it not be well to urge our brethren in the colleges not to permit any "short cuts" in mathematics? Who knows just who, of all the students in our colleges, will become evangelists after the flight of a few years? And what success will ever attend their efforts if they do not know how to "figger." For it is the figures that seem to bulk large in modern evangelism. When I try to wade through the bewildering figures in the Monday telegrams in our papers, I am led to wonder as to how many were received without the courtesy of a letter, how many came who had the "jining habit," how many were scared in, and how many will become regular attendants at the Lord's table, how many will place their names on the lists of regular contributors to the benevolences of the church. Preaching the gospel does have some part in modern evangelism, singing attracts its thousands, but what counts amongst the brethren is the ability to add. Subtractions are never reported, divisions never appear in print, but the multiplication table is of paramount importance. Teach the student preachers all you please about sciences, the Bible and theology, but above all, do not let him neglect the matter of "figgers." They count.

An Item of Good News.

After an address on foreign missions before the Southern California convention at Long Beach, the night of August 12, A. C. Smither, pastor of the First Church, Los Angeles, proposed, on behalf of himself and wife, to support a missionary on the foreign field, by giving $600 a year if two other persons would do the same. As quick as a flash, C. C. Chapman, of Fullerton, Cal., and W. L. Porterfield, of Long Beach, responded.

The church at Long Beach, E. W. Thornton, pastor, will also support a missionary, beginning March next.

We now have eight missionaries supported by as many personal friends. We ought to have, and I believe will soon have, 100.

During the past eight weeks four Living Link churches and four Living Link individuals have been won on the Pacific coast.

"What Shall I Do To Be Saved?"

We have been blessed in the use of copies of Acts of Apostles as a tract on "What shall I do to be saved?" We buy them from the American Bible Society, New York, at two cents per copy, plus express. The booklets are first given into the hands of our Christian Endeavorers, who mark in red ink the passages that relate to conversion. In the marking, they are directed by an experienced leader. This is an education to our young people and also makes the plan of salvation plain to the hurried reader.

We have given these booklets out by the hundreds and nothing done by us this year has made the impression that this work has done. The copies of Acts make a neat appearance and are much prized by the recipients. They are read by workmen in the shops, by women in the kitchen, by all sorts of people, everywhere. Our own members are wonderfully helped in doing personal work. The fact that this tract speaks with the authority of the Scripture carries great weight. Our success makes us think that many congregations ought to be distributing Acts of Apostles as a tract on "What shall I do to be saved?" Ten or twenty dollars spent in this way will be a most profitable investment.

Southern California Convention.

The annual state meeting of the Disciples of Christ at Santa Cruz, Cal., July 24-August 5, was up to the high standard of previous conventions, even excelling them in some particulars. First the attendance was larger than usual. Nearly 1,500 attendants registered and 233 official delegates, representing forty-seven churches, reported. All the business of the state convention was transacted by these delegates. Hence the convention was congregational, not only in theory but in practice.

The different departments of the convention, C. W. B. M., Y. P. S. C. E., Bible school and Berkeley Bible Seminary, furnished good reports and splendid programs.

Much of the business of the convention concerned itself with the problems of reconstruction of the churches in the stricken district and in re-establishing the "Pacific Christian."

A reconstruction commission was chosen, which plans large things for the cause in the bay cities. They ask for $200,000, one-half of which shall be raised by the local churches and the other half from outside sources. The brethren in California believe in large undertakings worthy of a great purpose and brotherhood
